[a] Safety on your money
[b] Yield on your money

I.—SAFETY : Building and Loan societies put 100 per cent of their investments in Real Estate. It is estimated that there are 9,000,000 share holders in Building and Loan Societies, having $5,000,000 in assets. Wayne county Savings Bank has $74,204,528 in savings :$41,140,576 is invested in Real Estate. The Central Savings and Trust Company has $28,961,093 in Savings, $27,294,298 are invested in Real Estate. The New York Life Insurance Company has $151,000,000 in assets invested in Illinois.
$94,000,000 Real Estate
$21,000,000 Railroad Bonds
$35,000,000 Public Utilities
$1,000,000 Municipal

Surely these facts are conclusive evidence of the safety of Real Estate.

II.—YIELD : In yield one cannot find so generous a return anywhere. In ten (10) years the following yields have been realized : Detroit 630 per cent; New York 217 per cent; Chicago 195 per cent; Atlanta 162 per cent; San Francisco, 159 per cent; Boston 137 per cent; Minneapolis 131 per cent; Kansas City 129 per cent; St. Louis 124 per cent; Cleveland 119 per cent; Philadelphia 116 per cent. Detroit yields three times as much as its next ranking city.

Those who were fortunate enough to tune in on Saturday evening on New York had the pleasure of hearing John McCormick the great tenor who sings at the Metropolitan Opera McCormick is known far and wide by his phonograph records made for the Victor people and is probably one of the highest paid artists in concert work. On Sunday evening after seven Madam Louise Homer also of the Metropolitan Opera appeared from the studios of the Atwater-Kent Company having come up from her home in eastern New York state for the purpose. Madam Homer and her daughter both sang into the microphone. Madam Homer has six children and her daughter who is a beautiful contralto soloist, sings with her mother. So far has science advanced that it is easy to sit in your own home and listen in on these world famous singers and if the air is just right, the rendering is fully as good as one would expect to get if in the presence of the singers.

Looks like a fierce scrap over the alleged graft case of the famous Tyrus Cobb and Speaker, base ball kings. The pastor of the First Methodist church in Detroit last Sunday evening surprised his audience quite suddenly by beginning his discourse with a denunciation of Judge Keenesaw M. Landis and the others who are accusing Cobb and Speaker. The Reverend gentleman is quite positive neither of these ball players could ever do wrong.

On the day preceeding New Years Sheriff Earl Kerr entertained his deputies throughout the county at a dinner at the Keefer Hotel. Considerable speech making and merriment was indulged in, and Sheriff Kerr informed his men just what he expected of them and how to go about it. All the other county officials were mostly present and assured the new Sheriff they would in all cases endeavor to work in conjunction with his force. Following are the deputies as appointed: Adams, Ray Barnhart; Somerset, Mark Rutan (re-instated); Scipio, Fred Pennoyer; Litchfield, W. D. O'Neil; Fayette, Clayton Morgan; Pittsford, James Lauder; Cambria M. F. Fisher; Jefferson, Vern Cole; Reading, D. J. Morgan; Hillsdale, Fred Barron (re-instated), O. B. Perrine, Charles Stevens, Joe Robinson, J. Rose; Wright, Lee Pratt; Ransom, Mr. Harmon; Under Sheriff—Alton Skuse; Turnkey, Alexander Arnt. Sheriff Kerr especially stated he had disregarded politics in his appointments and he hoped that every man during his term of office would entirely eliminate politics from his motives. This fact is evidenced by the personnel of the deputies which is mostly Republican only one or two being Democrats. This does not necessarily mean there are few capable men among the Democrats but it does mean that when a man has proven his worth and he is the choice of the people he goes in, regardless of party affiliations. The new Sheriff calculates his election was brought about very much in that way.

CLARE POSTMASTER HOLDS RECORD WITH SEVEN APPOINTMENTS

Samuel C. Kirkbride, reappointed by President Coolidge recently as postmaster at Clare, is believed to hold the Michigan record. He has been postmaster by appointment of presidents more years than any other like officer in the state, so far as can be ascertained.

His first appointment for a four-year term was by President Harrison in 1889. Then came President Cleveland, who gave Clare a Democratic postmaster for four years.

On the reutrn of the Republicans to power in 1897, President McKinley appointed Mr. Kirkbride postmaster and gave him a reappointment in 1901. President Roosevelt gave him a fourth term in 1905, and President Taft, in 1909, appointed him for a fifth term.

When the Wilson Administration came into power, in 1913, Postmaster Kirkbride, for a second time, was retired and a Democrat given the office. The Republicans returning to power in 1921, President Harding appointed him for a sixth term, so the appointment which President Coolidge now gives him is his seventh.

SUBERB GETS LIGHTS UNDER NEW STATE LAW

Parkdale, a suburb north of Manistee on M-11, switched on its new street lighting system. Parkdale is the first place in Manistee county to get lights under the new state law which requires townships to provide illumination up to a cost of $600 annually, upon petition of the citizens.

The suburbs of Oak Hill and Filer City, south of Manistee, are to be lighted under the same law, as soon as the equipment is ready.

The village of Eastlake was given an electric line during the summer. Three other villages, Onekama, Klaeva and Copemish, have signed franchises for electric power and lights and the lines now are being built. Line to Orchard Beach State park, providing lights for Manistee to the park also is in use.

WORLD FLIER HONORED BY JAPANESE EMPEROR

The warld tour of Lieutenant Henry H. Ogden, one of the men who made the famous "round-the-world" flight for the United States army in 1924, came to a safe landing at Selfridge field when Mayor Thomas G. Lanphier, commander of the field, conferred upon Ogden the Cross of the Order of the Sacred Treasure of Japan.

Lieutenant Odgen, now out of the service and living in Detroit, received the cross as recognition by the Emperor of Japan of his part in the historic fight.

22,000 VISITED CAMP AT EAST TAWAS PARK

Approximately 22,000 persons camped at the East Tawas state park this season, according to Simon Goupil, the caretaker. This was an increase of more than 50 per cent over last year. On some occasions the park was too crowded for late visitors and these were directed to the free tourist camps in the Michigan National forest and along the Au Sable river.

Cars came this year from every state in the union and many of the provinces of Canada. The park of 16 acres has an exceptionally fine beach, bordering Lake Huron.

WEATHER BLOCKED DEER SLAUGHTER

The open season on deer is closed in Michigan with bucks and does more plendtiful in the rapidly increasing second growth than ever before since the one-buck law went into effect, according to authentic information from game wardens, woodsmen and naturalists who have viewed with alarm past decreases and are now optimistic about the future.

Despite the fact that an estimated 50,000 hunters in Michigan bought hunting licenses as compared with 41,000 last year, fewer deer were slain than last year, wardens say. Last year there were 18,000 animals slaughtered in the lower and upper peninsula. This year the number is much smaller and the number of deer still at large much larger.

The reason for the lesser slaughter this year was decidedly unfavorable weather conditions. Deer were plentiful and nothing but a wholesale killing was in prospect. A fall of snow before November 15 substantiated this belief. Rain and warm weather caused the snow to disappear just before the season opened and made bogs of lowlands where hunting was impossible and where deer retreated when the first shot was fired.

UPPER PENINSULAR IS STILL HAUNT OF OLD CIRCUIT RIDER

In the old days of the middle west, the circuit rider was a picturesque and romantic feature of the American frontier settlements, but advancing civilization gradually drove him from the open trails, leaving his work as another memorial to the hardiness of the American pioneers.

In the upper peninsula of Michigan, however, a lonely circuit rider still keeps up the custom established during pioneer days, riding the rural roads in winter and summer, carrying the gospel to the more remote farmers and back woodsmen. He is Rev. John Leonard of Marquette.

Rev. Leonard carries the gospel into hundreds of isolated homes, where during the long weeks of the northern winter members of the family are unable to attend church. He is not a young student seeking experience, but a veteran preacher, who travels afoot, or on sleighs with members of his scattered congregation, because he loves the work and the people with whom he comes in contact. Before assuming the role of circuit rider, Rev. Leonard was stationed at the Epworth church at Saginaw and later at Hancock.

NOVEMBER SET RECORD FOR COLD AT HOUGHTON

November was the coldest November recorded by the United States weather bureau station at Houghton, with but one exception, since the station went into operation 26 years ago, according to Meteorologist H. B. Cowdick, in charge of the station.

The mean temperature was 28 degrees higher than the mean temperature of November, 1911, the coldest November on record at the Portage Lake station. The normal temperature for the month is 32 degrees.

November 5, this year, was the only day during the whole month on which there was not some sign or trace of precipitation. The aggregate for the month was 5.05 inches, as compared with a normal precipitation of 2.80 inches.

The wind movement for the month was almost normal, preceeding at the average rate of 11.7 miles an hour, with a total movement of 8,435 miles. The maximum velocity for five minutes was 40 miles an hour on November 26.

SHOE BLACK IS BANDIT CUSTOMER TELLS POLICE

S. J. Kay, of Detroit, was watching a bootblack put a polish on his shoes, when he happened to glance from his shoes to the bootblack.

After one look at the shoe polisher, Kay called a policeman who arrested the bootblack, Leon Salkany, 23 years old, on a charge of robbery armed.

Kay claimed Salkany is one of two men who held him up November 22, and robbed him of a signet ring and 75 cents.

A new lead paint which affords complete and permanent protection of iron from rust has been developed in Switzerland. Experiments made with iron objects painted with the new preparation do not show any signs of rust after prolonged exposure of even after having been heated in steam.

Baking Powder, yeast and other leavening products were produced in the United States in 1925 to a total value of $68,593,014.

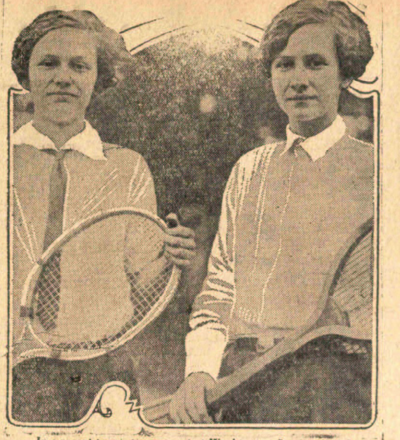
Twins Make Touney Family Affair Leave Fans Confused Over Victory



In a recent tennis tournament at Washington Seminary, Atlanta. Georgia, Jenny Lind Mather and Mary Francis Mather, not only won the doubles championship but met in the finals in the singles. Unless the photographer became confused. Mary, at the left, won the title. The judges were confused most of the time as to who was leading.

MICHIGAN'S LOSS IN WAR HEAVY

Final figures on battle casualties suffered by American soldiers in the World War are the feature of the annual report of Major-General Robert C. Davis, adjutant-general of the United States army.

These figures were issued after checking and re-checking of hundreds of thousands of records in the files of the war department. They show a grand total of 244,173 casualties. Of these, 50,510 were deaths in battle, 37,568 occurring in action, and 12,942 resulting from wounds received that did not result in death. Such wounds involved 182,674 individuals, nearly 11,000 of whom were wounded more than once.

Michigan soldiers in the American Expeditionary Forces sustained 9,046 casualties, or nearly 4 per cent of the total, although the population of the state was only a little over 3 per cent of the population of the country. Of the Michigan casualties, 1,532 represented those who were killed in action and 525 those who died of wounds, the remainder being non-mortal wounds.

The grand total of army casualties does not include any casualties of the navy or marine corps, even when sustained in army operations, nor does it cover accidental casualties or shell shock. It is recorded, however, that the number of shell shock casualties was 5,016.

Most of the American casualties were suffered in the Meuse-Argonne offensive, where 122,063 were wounded, including 26,277 who died.

OLD CHURCH SOLD WHEN CONGREGATIONS COMBINE

The Marion Center Methodist church—tragic example of fast disappearing country churches—went on the auction block.

Although the church has several hundred dollars to its credit in a Howell bank, it has been closed for four years and is fast falling into decay.

For many years the Marion Center church was a rallying place for people of the section. The church prospered and built a parsonage next door. A resident pastor was brought in. Then the Methodist and Congregational churches of Pinckney consolidated and the pastor was taken away. The parsonage was sold and a few months later the doors barred.

EXTREMES OF STATE GIVE ALMA GRIDIRON CAPTAINS

Alma College foot ball teams are making a habit of jumping to the various extremes of the state in the selection of captains. This year's captain was Walter Burton of Manistique, near the Wisconsin line, the previous year was Rex Anderson of Alma and next year's captain is Leslie Hawthorne of Detroit.

Hawthorne, elected as the 1927 Alma fot ball leader, has played half on the Alma team for three years. Like a number of other athletics now at Alma, Hawthorne is from Detroit Northwestern.

A new device has been designed in England for the purpose of taking to crews of sunken submarines. The apparatus consists of a buoy carried alongside the conning tower. If the submarine is unable to rise the buoy can be released and, being filled with compressed air, rises quickly to the surface and floats above the sunken vessel by a cable. The buoy contains a telephone by which rescuers and the imprisoned men con communicate. It also holds rockets, a lighting apparatus and a signal bell.

U. OF M. CO-ED FOR FIRST TIME CHOSEN TO LEAD JUNIOR "HOP"

Helen M. Belcher of Manistee, a junior co-ed of the University of Michigan, has been chosen by Thomas Winter of Grand Rapids as his partner to lead the Junior "hop" of the university that will be held at Ann Arbor on February 11. Leadership of the "hop" is the highest social honor that the university can offer to a girl.

Winter's selection breaks a tradition that has become established thru long years that a student of the school should never be chosen. Girls from other schools have always had this honor.

The custom that is to be broken this year started during the first days of the university, when women students first were admitted. The men objected to making Michigan a co-educational school.

FIRST SHADE TREE IN FREMONT IS RAZED FOR SAFETY SAKE

It is an old saying that "Every good thing must come to an end," and that is what has happened to the old chestnut tree, the first shade tree planted in Fremont. It has seen the growth of the city from a single log cabin in the wilderness to a thriving community.

Thad Waters was one of the first group of settlers who came into the wilderness in 1855. On the way at Grand Rapids, he picked up a chestnut that he planted near the old Weaver log cabin, the first to be built here. The log cabin stood on the site of the Reber residence.

The chestnut grew into a very sizeable tree, but a few years ago it began to decay and finally has been felled to prevent it accidental falling with possible injury to persons or property.

FIND SCHOOL BUILT ON PRIVATE LAND

That a Detroit public school stands on privately-owned property came to light when the board of education started suit to obtain title to the site.

The building, the T. Dale Cooke school, in Redford Park, is one of the schools which came into the Detroit school district last May through this city's annexation of the Redford territory. Until the question was raised, Detroit authorities took it for granted that the land went with the building.

Investigation has shown, however, according to Arthur F. Lederle, assistant corporation counsel that Redford School District No. 1, after failing to agree with the land owners over the price, built on the property without further ado.

RED, WHITE PINES PLANTED TOGETHER IN RE-FORESTRATION

Red pine planted with white pine in reforestation projects is recommended by the forestry department of Michigan State College. Experience has shown that where more than one type of a specie, or more than one specie is planted in a lot, each is less susceptible to disease.

While the white pine blister rust has never been discovered in Michigan, the danger of inroads by this disease is believed to be great enough that red pine, which is not affected by the disease, should be grown in mixture with the white pine, which is damaged and killed by it.

The difficulty presented by red pine in forestry nursery work is the irregularity with which it bears seed and the resulting high price. Recently a 10-pound package of red pine seed, valued at $150, was received by the college forestry department. The seed will be planted in the college nursery.

Red pine will thrive on anything from sandy to rocky soil and requires less moisture than white pine.

LOCATING COURTHOUSE IS PROBLEM IN JACKSON

Can a compromise location for a new courthouse be arranged so that residents of the east side of Jackson and those of the west side will be satisfied?

This is a question that is facing advocates of a million dollar county building proposition which was defeated at the last election by a substantial majority, because many say, it was located too far over on the west side to please the east side voters. This site was on the present location of the old courthouse, and it was proposed to pass a bond issue of $800,000 covering the cost of erecting a towering structure for the county's use. The present building was built more than 50 years ago.

A new fire control instrument for the operation of anti-aircraft guns has been perfected by the U. S. navy department. The device, which transmits electricity all firing data to the anti-aircraft batteries, is said to direct shell fire with such accuracy that anti-aircraft can anticipate the path of a flying plane and by merely setting the fuse of an explosive shell can fire so the shell and plane will meet at a previously calculated point. The instrument is described as having 40,000 working parts.

Records eaken over a period of 36 years show that the greatest number of influenza cases occur about the ninth or tenth week of the year.

QUAIL WITH LITTLE PROTECTION THRIVE IF CLIMATE PERMITS

Attractive and suitable cover, sufficient and proper food supply, protection from vermin—these three requisites, if provided, will insure a continuing supply of quail in any locality where climatic conditions permit, and allow a reasonable amount of annual shooting.

Quail are so prolific, producing at least one, and often two clutches of from 10 to 24 eggs each per year, that there can be no question of their increase and abundance when given suitable cover, food and protection.

Lack of any one, of the three requisites, however, is fatal. Farms so intensively cultivated and pastured that there is no cover can have no quail.

Cover, be it ever so attractive, without suitable food, will be equally barren, and what doth it profit an ambitious pair of bobwhites to produce one or more clutches of fertile eggs and, maybe, hatch out large families of lusty young birds, if they are to be devoured by rats, snakes, skunks, crows, hawks, cats and dogs?

U. S. JOINS STATE IN WAR TO ERADICATE CORN BORER PLAGUE

Assured of support from the state department of agriculture, the U. S. Bureau of Entomology and farmers of the state, Michigan State college specialists are marshalling agricultural research and extension forces into fighting array for a merciless battle against the European corn borer, whose progress during the last summer has brought the universal realization of the danger which threatens Michigan agriculture.

Although since 1921, experts at the State college, foremost among them Professor R. H. Pettit, head of the entomology department, and Professor J. F. Cox, farm crops head, have been aware of the menace, it has only been in the last two or three years to the necessity for action in curbing the spread of the borer. A combination of climatic conditions this summer served to intensify the peril, for heavy July winds carried the moths into sections formerly untouched.

11-YEAR OLD BOY MAKES RECORD AS GARDNER

Memphis boasts one of the youngest amateur gardeners in the state. He is LeRoy McConnell, 11 years old, son of Mr. and Mrs. V. B. McConnell. Besides selling considerable of his produce, young McConnell stocked the cellar of his home with the winter's supply of vegetables, all from a plot of ground only an acre and a half in extent. Besides taking care of his garden, LeRoy is his father's general handyman on the farm, proudly declaring that most of the chores that the average boy considers only drudgery, are fun for him. Here is what his tiny farm produced this year: Potatoes, 200 bushels; carrots, 100 bushels; cabbage, 500; pumpkins, 550; and quantities of Swiss chard, beets, cucumbers, oyster vegetables, lettuce, radishes, onions, beans, sweet corn and tomatoes.

With the approach of cold weather, students in the dormitories at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology have designed several automatic devices for closing windows and turning on the steam heat about a half hour before rising time. One of the most ingenious plans is a switch, operated by clockwork, closing the house current circuit through two stoves, one of which has a pan of cereal upon it, the other a coffee pot.

PARASITE DEATH TO SMALL FISH

The river lamprey, a small parasitic eel that grows to a foot or so in length, is a deadly enemy of all fish and a creature of loathesone horror to the angler whenever he finds one attached to a freshly landed prize.

The lamprey, found in practically all the fresh water lakes and streams in the country, is equipped with a cup-shaped mouth fringed teeth by which it obtains a hold upon its victim. Usually the eel fastens itself to the fish's belly or gill, where it remains until the fish dies. Wherever the fish swims the lamprey goes with it, clinging stubbornly to the scaly body of its host, whose life blood is steadily consumes.

Sometimes the angler catches a wall-eyed pike with two or three lampreys clinging to it. Sometimes as many as a dozen are found upon sturgeon, which, like the wall-eyes, feed upon the bottom, where the lampreys lurk. Bullheads, also bottom feeders, are frequently the victims of lampreys.

A sportsman, while duck shooting, saw a bullhead grasping near the surface of the water with a large lamprey clinging to its back. The fish was nearly dead as the result of the steady drain of its strength by the eel. The sportsman hit the lamprey with his paddle and the eel wiggled away, seeking another victim. A small circular spot about the size of a dime showed where it had slung by its mouth which acts as a cavuum cup, to the bullhead.

Big fish, such as sturgeon and the larger wall-eyes, are apparently not much affected by the lampreys. With small fish, however, it is different. Eventually the eel so weakens the fish that it dies.

CLARE MAN CLAIMS EGG EATING TITLE THO 2 TOP HIS RECORD

Roy Comer of Clare still claims to be the champion egg eater of the country, despite the fact that two men went beyond his 30-egg record at the contest which was staged in a Clare restaurant. The match was witnessed by 200 persons. "Dutch" Hoyt, of Mt. Pleasant, who challenged Comer and was informed by the champion that he must first qualimy by establishing a record, did not keep his agreement with the other contestants and refused to eat. Ralph Howard and Fred Phillips, both of Clare, entered the contest. Phillips quit at his eighteenth egg. Howard ate 30 and after a brief rest, took five more.

Comer, who was present, took a "lunch" of two dozen eggs. When he began eating, Rax Carrier, who was Comer's contestant when he made his first record, took his seat at the table and ate 36 eggs.

Comer stated that Howard and Carrier now are eligible to contest his title. He is willing to meet them on one day's notice, and declares he can eat at least 50 eggs.

AMPLE LEEWAY TO FILL PURSES GIVEN TO STATE TRAPPERS

With nothing left to occupy the sportsman's time except the hunting of rabbits, raccoon and predatory animals from now on until mid-February, the trap-line comes into its own.

Laws governing the taking of furbearers for the 1926-1927 season give the trapper plenty of leeway in enriching his bank account. Beaver, otter, fisher and marten trapping is tabooed until 1930, but mink and muskrat open up February 1, running until March 31. From all indications the muskrat catch will top all furbearers. Skunk is open from November 1 to March 31, racoon from October 25 to December 31. Fox, wildcat, wolf, coyote and weasel can be taken at any time of the year.

Smokers, spears, baited hooks, explosives and chemicals are barred in taking fur-bearing animals.

GROUNDED SHIPS STRESS NEEED FOR DEEP CHANNEL

Need for deepening the harbor channel at Charlevoix was seen by the grounding of the heavily loaded steel freighter, Scranton, outbound from East Jordan. Unless the harbor channel leading to and from Lake Michigan and that through from Round lake to Lake Charlevoix are deepened there will be no use of erecting the proposed large wharves on Round lake and Lake Charlevoix next season, for the big lake ships will be unable to reach the ports of Charlevoix, East Jordan and Boyne City, it is pointed out by some navigation experts.

Experiments are being conducted in Virginia on the development of a new smokeless fuel derived from soft coal. The new fuel, between a coke and a coal, can be produced and sold at a lower price than anthracite, but probably will cost slightly more than soft coal.

The secret of making paper was first discovered by the Chinese by watching wasps build their nests.

Two hundred and ine persons lost their lives as a result of accidents in coal mines during the month of October in the United States.

Roberta Risks It

BY MARGARET CAMERON

MARGARET CAMERON LEWIS

P. G. (Piggy) Brazenose is an amiable young man with a diverting habit of getting into strange escapades—to the discomfort of his Big Business dad. By sheer chance he is placed in a position to be of aid to a spirited young lady, Roberta Scott. Her dad is holding "captive" her younger sister because of a love affair. He threatens to spoil her whole life in his misplaced zeal to "save" her from the lover he disapproves.

Piggy and Roberta elude a detective who is following her—a precaution of her father's—and head for the Scott country home where the sister is held. They use Piggy's car. For safety's sake, Roberta is disguised in widow's weeds. On the way, it develops that her father and Piggy's are business rivals. Undismayed they hurry on to the New Hampshire country place. En route, at a small town, Piggy is "discovered" by a college pal, but manages to shake him. Back on the road, they make a halt and dye his hair black to save him from further recognition. Also he dons a chauffeur's costume. Arrived at last at the scene of action, which is carefully guarded, Roberta and Piggy investigate. Without warning Roberta's father speeds into the situation; obviously the attempted "rescue" has been reported to him. H fortunately, does not recognize them. Here the story pauses while the events leading up to the adventure are cleared. It is shown why Roberta's finance, Nixon, was forced to ask Piggy to help her in his stead. Her father owns considerable stock in Nixon's struggling business and threatens to ruin him if he attempts to help Roberta in her crusade in her sister's behalf. Meanwhile Piggy's father worries over business troubles, chief of which is Scott's threatened invasion of his own field. On the field of action Piggy and Roberta establish a lookout post overseeing the Scott place. They discover that Celia, the younger sister, is being paternally bullid by her inconsiderate father. As they watch they discuss what's to be done. Roberta suggests that her finance—the man who started Piggy off on the chase—should know what's going on. At which Piggy snorts indignantly. And the plot proceeds to thicken. They go into the nearest fillage, where Piggy is lucky enough to strike up a friendship with the Scott chauffeur. He gets his father's former housekeeper, a dour but highly respectable Scotch woman, to come to keep house and play propriety for "Mrs. Smith" and her "chauffeur." Then the plot thickens as the story books say, so read on.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

In the meantime, Piggy has decided to sleep at the house instead of at the tavern, as originally planned, but he insisted upon Robert's dining alone in state in the dining room, while he took his meal from the kitchen table with Janet. He said you never could tell, in a small community, who might snoop up to a window to look or listen, or what excuse might serve for a sudden call.

After dinner that first night, he joined Roberta in the living room, where she sat beside a bright wood fire.

"Is there any way we can let Celia know we're around?" he asked. "Hadn't you some signal as kids that we could use now? Think," he urged when she shook her head. "It'll put grit into her—help her hold out—if she even suspects that you may be on the job. Isn't there something I can whistle, or a code I can rap out, or something?"

"No. Not a thing."

"Darn! That means we can't wait long, then. She's near the breaking point. Where's her room?"

"She used to have the one over the door to the terrace, but they may have moved her now. Why?"

"Allright. I'm off. Don't wait up for me."

"Where are you going?"

"Out for a ride on my new bike," he answered, grinning. "Crazy about it. Can't wait."

"Peter! You're not going to try anything tonight? Not with father here!"

"Not likely, but you never can tell. Anyhow, I'll have a look-see. 'Night."

Wearing his new brown overalls and a heavy canvas hunting coat, with sandwiches, an electric torch and a revolver in his pockets, Piggy set out under a black and lowering sky for Birchwood.

Laboriously pedaling through the darkness of the woods, Piggy could have wished that they had established their base somewhere nearer the scene of action. Bicycling had gone out of fashion in his world and long before he reached the foot of Lookout Hill, as Roberta had named their point of observation that afternoon, forgotten muscles mere refreshing his knowledge of anatomy. He had a premonition that for a day or two it would behoove him to avoid situations demanding extreme physical agility.

Persevering, however, he made as good speed as the rough road allowed, and at last arrived at the fork leading to Birchwood. He could see the lights of the house twinkling through the trees. A little farther on he dismounted, extinguished the oil lamp serving as a headlight, and concealed the bicycle in a thicket, though it was unlikely that anyone would discover it, as he had found the roads deserted.

By the light of his electric torch, hidden from Birchwood by a spur of the hill, he made his way to the summit, from which he could look down upon Scott's demense. Only the lower part of the house was lighted and the shades had not been drawn. He cursed himself for not bringing his field-glasses, on the remote chance that with it he might have learned which room was Celia's. Presently it began to rain, and shortly thereafter the lower lights went out and others appeared in the second story. Chuckling in the dripping darkness, he reflected that probably the household was going to bed early because G. A. was sleepy. As the luminous oblong rectangles appeared one by one, he saw that the shades had already been drawn at the upper windows and that the room over the terrace was occupied, but whether by Celia not even his glass would have told him.

He waited twenty minutes or so after the last light had gone out, and then, assuming that the weary lord of the manor would have sunk into slumber and hoping that Celia had not, he pierced the quiet air with whistled strains of a college song, the refrain of which he thought ought to carry comforting assurance to the imprisoned one.

"Poco, Poco, keep thine eye
On the fair-haired girl, for she is sly;
You'll be sorry by and by-y-y
You ever had a daugh-ter."

For several minutes he broadcast his cryptic assurance, diminishing its volume at the end as if he were strolling away. Then, carefully, he crept down the hill toward the fence, intending to make a reconnaisance and determine where, in case a dashing raid became necessary, it would be desirable to cut the barbed wire. But quiet though he was, the dogs heard him, or perhaps scented him, and forthwith set up a fortissimi chorus.

"Ah, there, my hearties," said Piggy. "Right on the job, aren't you? Good boys, darn you! Well—we'll fix you when the time comes. Shut up, you brutes! You'll have the whole countryside out after me!"

Beating a hasty retreat, he descended the hill on the other side, but even after he had retreived his wheel and was trundling painfully back toward Fitzwilliam, he heard an occassional indignant woof from Birchwood.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

Roberta met him at the door with anxious inquiries.

"I told you to go to bed," he said.

"I know—but I couldn't. What happened?"

"Nothing, except that those blamed dogs raised the deuce of a row before I got anywhere near the fence."

She dropped dejectedly into a chair. "I don't believe we can do it. She's too well guarded. It's all been for nothing."

"Rats! You're tired out. What you need is sleep and plenty of it. Lots of people have escaped from a darn sight tighter place than Birchwood, all by themselves. And with us to help—"

"But she doesn't know we're here."

"She will. I started something tonight."

"What? How?"

"From the top of the hill. Listen." Twinkling, he whistled the hopeful refrain, and Roberta smiled with her memory of the words. Then she sighed and shook her head.

"Clever, Peter; but I'm afraid she won't understand."

"She will, if I work it every night. She's bound to catch the idea in time, if we don't get her some other way first. The only trouble is that somebody else might catch it, too. Still, we have to take some chances. You haven't thought of anything she'd recognize you by, have you?"

"Nothing that would do any good. We did have a secret alphabet when she was about twelve and used to write each other notes in it."

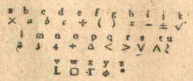
"Bully!"

"We used to read it like print, but I'm not sure I could remember it now, and probably she's forgotten it, too. Besides, we couldn't get a note to her."

"We might. You never can tell. Let's write one or two anyhow, so we'll be ready if the chance comes."

Not having provided themselves with stationery, he brought her some wrapping paper from the kitchen and bade her write down her alphabet while he changed into dry clothing, forgetting in the zest of the game his adjurations regarding her rest.

At first she could remember only that she had originally evolved a code from Algebraic characters, supplemented by similar arbitrary signs culled from the back pages of a dictionary, and that the symbol of equality had been used to separate the words. But by the time Piggy came downstairs again, arrayed in the habiliments of his normal station in life, she had recalled most of it, and impelled by his urgency, finally filled in the remaining letters. Looking over her shoulder, this is what he saw:

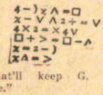


"Three cheers!" He reached into his pocket for a notebook.

"What good will that do you?" she asked, as he began copying the characters.

"Dunno. Might come in handy. Now, let's write her some notes. If one doesn't get through, another may. Better use torn bits of this brown paper, so if anybody else finds 'em they'll look like scraps of something. You write: 'Here waiting chance. Listen for whistle. Show light.' I'll write, 'Night whistle signal. Answer with light.' Sign 'em both R." After experimenting a little, he added: "That sign between the words is a giveaway. Show's it's a code. Better spilt 'em up into several lines. I'll show you."

Having written his message, he looked at it, grinning. "It will take some thinking to decode that. "Golly! this cipher is a pippin! It's so darn arbitrary. Look." He handed her a scrap of paper bearing the following legend:



"That'll keep G. A. guessing awhile."

Roberta laughed. "It does look cryptic. If only she remembers it—and if we can get it to her!"

"Sure, we'll get it to her"

He placed the notes carefully in his bill-fold, and considerably after midnight, cheered by his confidence, Roberta went to bed and to sleep.

The next morning, wincing from his lame muscles, Piggy visited the village store in a heavy downpour, to make inquiries about obtaining an automobile license. He learned that aplication should be made to the sherrif at the lower village, officially entitled Fitzwilliam Depot, a smaller settlement hugging the raiwaly tracks—Fitzwilliam proper, like many New England hamlets, being situated at some distance from the station. When he returned to the house for the car, he said to Roberta, with a chuckle:

"We've got to watch our step. They asked be at the store who was sick over here."

"Sick. Why?"

"Some woman looked out last night and saw a light in this house as late as 12 o'clock, and it's all over the village. They thought somebody must be dying. I told 'em you suffered from insomnia and sometimes sat up all night reading, but it's a good tip. When things begin to pop, we'll douse the lights. I may drive over to Keene after I see about this license, and scout around a little. Perhaps I'll meet up with my friend Cody. Back when I get here."

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

Left alone with Janet, Roberta, refreshed by sound sleep and again buoyant, encouraged the old woman to talk. Already won by the girl's frank, friendly manner—though far from admitting this in words—and sympathizing with her anxiety for her sister, Janet vouchsafed a series of tales about the lad and his parents. At length, when the barriers seemed down, Roberta inquired, with a careless air:

"By the way, what's Mr. Brazenose's name? I've always heard him called Piggy, which is rather awful for a man like him. Is it Pygamalion?"

"Ask him," quoth Janet. As has been said, except for a strong burr and a occasional Scottish locution, she usually spoke uncolored English, save in moments when excitement brought the dialect of her childhood to her tongue, or when she indulged herself with intimates. "His mother gave him his name, and I take it ill of him that he doesn't like it for her sake. Maybe he'll tell ye but ye'll not get it from me."

"Check!" said Roberta to herself, her lids veiling twinkling eyes. Aloud she returned: "Oh, well, it doesn't matter. I just wondered."

But the virus of curiosity was working in her blood, and undeterred by the sad fate that once upon a time had overtaken several ladies of similar purpose, she resolved to gain admittance to the secret closet. That she might leave her head suspended by its long brown hair in the grizzly chamber occurred to her no more than to her unfortunate prototypes, and in any case she would have pictured herself as a triumphant blending of two legendary characters—she who lived to tell of turning that protentous key, and the lady who won a sultan's favor by her skilled loquacity. Not for nothing was Roberta a daughter of Eve and young.

Meanwhile, Percival Galahad, in the guise of Peter Brown, having learned from the sheriff that he might expect his New Hampshire license plates within a few days, drove to Keene, where he invested in rubber to the extent of a coat and boots, forseeing a possible series of wet nights on Lookout Hill. Then he lounged about town, making acquaintances among the tradesmen and spreading the tidings that Mrs. Smith had settled in Fitzwilliam for the winter. When he was told that Wednesday afternoon was a half holiday and that all the shops would close, he abandoned his plan to remain through the day in the hope that Cody would appear, and was about to return to his base when he caught sight of Scott's man guiding a high, box-like Ford through the main street.

"Hey, Jim!" he yelled.

Cody waved a hand and turned the nose of his vehicle toward the curb, parking in the local fashion. Piggy surveyed the conveyance with a humorously saturnine eye.

"Come to that, have you?"

"Well, the old man keeps one up here for marketing and such. These roads shake a real car all to pieces. Lizzies ain't so bad for a hick country."

"Maybe. Never drove one myself." Having thus established his own lofty position, Piggy tactfully came down to common footing. "How about a drink?"

"Surest thing you know! Guess I've got time." Cody looked at his watch before leading the way to a barroom. At that time these social centers still flourished, even in New Hampshire. "What you doin' here on a day like this?"

"Tryin' to forget Fritz. What brought you in?"

"Errands for the women. Everythin' in this burg shuts up tight Wednesday afternoons, an' o' course they remembered at the last minute that they was all out o' yarn and embroidery cotton an' stuff. Couldn't possibly ha' thought of it yesterday, when I had to come in anyhow. They ain't got nothin' else to do, an' they make enoufih fancy junk to stock a dozen church affairs. Mis' Scott knits her head off an' Celia embroideries things. Gawd, it's a gay life!"

Piggy's eyes lighted with a triumphant gleam and he resolved to stick tighter than a brother to Cody while he made his purchases. Concealing his elation under a sardonic grin, he drawled:

"Say, you oughter try livin' with a weepin' widow for a while. Talk about a gay life! Still, you can't blame the poor thing. She's all broke up. But it's an ill wind that blows nobody good. I never thought I'd run acrost you today. Know yet how long you've goin' to stay?"

"All this week, I guess. I hear the old man talkin' to the office by phone this mornin,' an' he said he wouldn't be back 'til Monday, unless sum'n happened wrong down there."

"Fine! I won't die of lonsomeness before next week, anyhow. Say, s'pose I chase around with you while you do your errands, an' then we have lunch at the hotel?"

"Well—I guess that'll be all right. I'll have to call up the old man an' make sure."

"Gee! he must be a slave driver! Don't you have no time off at all?"

"Yep. One half-day a week, but this ain't it. I'll tell him I run acrost a friend from home."

After absorbing a small amount of stimulant, Cody made his purchases, with the other in close and observant attendance. This accomplished, they went to the hotel, where Piggy obligingly offered to take charge of the numerous parcels when his friend went to the telephone.

Unfortunately, Celia's embroidery cotton and her mother's wools had been wrapped together, and the conspirator could think of no plausible excuse for opening the large parcel in the hotel office, where he sat waiting for Cody. He contrived, however, to slip the twine off at one end and loosen the folds of paper enough to smuggle in one of the cipher notes, hoping that it would meet the girl's eye. He also surreptitiously consulted his notebook, after restoring the twine to its proper place, and on the outside of the same parcel he penciled:

"The unknown quantity, plus is greater than, plus, equals is greaterf than."

If by any chance Celia saw this and remembered the cipher, "Here. R." would give her courage, while to others the symbols would convey no meaning.

Arising with a grin as Cody approached, he slipped notebook and pencil into a side pocket, and they went to the dining room. Thereafter the conversation was all of automobiles and adventures in which these had played a part, and fearing a reaction of suspicion after Celia had disappeared if he displayed too much curiosity now, the stranger asked no question about persons and conditions at Birchwood.

But it was a radiant smile he gave Roberta upon his return that afternoon announcing: "Luck's with us."

He was less certain of this, however, when he stood on the hill that night in a pouring rain, with aching muscles, and whistled his signal to the black and unresponsive void. The second night and the third were like unto the first event that by Friday the sky began to clear.

GLASS BLOWER AT U. OF M.

The ensgagement of a glass blower and installation of fully equipped apparatus for his work has increased the facilities of the physics department of the University of Michigan for experimental work, according to Professor H. M. Randall, director of the physics laboratory.

Marion Rewarded

Marion Tallev.

In recognition of her vocal ability and popularity, the Metropolitan Opera management, New York, has voluntarily torn up the contract held by Marion Talley, youthful Kansas City singer, given her another with a much higher figure and also a substantial bonus. This is unusual since this is only Miss Talley's second opera season.

FORD RICHES PUT AT $2,000,000,000

Henry Ford's fortune is two billion dollars, based on the earning capacity of his huge automobile interests. At present, with his son, Edsel, he carries a cash balance in Detroit which varies somewhere between $300,000,000 and $350,000,000.

A prominent Detroit statistician is authority for the first statement. The president of one of Detroit's largest national banks mentioned Henry Ford's cash balance in an offhand way as though it was ordinary.

What if the Ford Motor Company did cease producing Model T four-cylinder powered automobiles tomorrow? Few of us realize that his plants would keep going at a lively clip producing parts for the 14,000,000 Fords that have already been built and sold.

BE YOURSELF, ADVICE TO FAT OR THIN PERSONS

Cultivate your individuality. If you want to be thin and not fat, aim to be as thin as it is normal for you. Don't take your neighbor's figure as your standard.

One of nature's laws is the law of heredity. Like begets like. It is a rule that applies to human beings as well as to any other form of life.

Be yourself, not what Dame Fashion tells you to be. It is the path that leads to healthy living. It is the only safe way.

To lose weight often is a problem for the women who wish to become thin but it becomes as much a problem for some women to put on weight.

SHIP FIRM FINED BY U. S. ORDERS BOAT RETURNED

The Peninsula & Northern Navigation Co. steamer United States has been ordered to return to Canadian waters and the company has been fined $5,000 by the government for violating the marine law. The boat was seized several months ago and the company which operated between Grand Haven, Muskegon and Milwaukee was forced to suspend operations.

The complaint charged that a majority of the stock was Canadian-owned, while the boat operated in American waters.

MARINER CALLS LAKE STORMS WORST KNOWN

Captain Nels Palmer of Ludington has never seen so prolonged a period of continuous storms on Lake Michigan as this autumn. He has been in the coast guard service on the lake 26 years.

The storms have been a severe blow to shipping, and especially to commercal fishermen.

SEE INCREASED OAT YIELD WITH BEST SEED

Results of oat improvement experiments conducted on Michigan State college plots during the past summer indicate that it is possible for Michigan farmers to increase their oat yield annually about 5,000,000 bushels by planting seed from high yielding strains.

CHICKENS COLORED RICH YELLOW BY DIET MOSTLY CORN

Consumers of poultry may have wondered at Thanksgiving why the dressed poultry on display in butcher shops were pale white and not the rich yellow of former years. There's a reason. It's Michigan's soft corn crop.

Unable to shell the corn with mechanical shellers, farmers found it necessary to feed substitutes for corn or else buy corn from the elevator and pay a long price for it—freight from Iowa plus handling charges and middlemen's profits. Most farmers resorted to the use of grain substitutes.

Barley proved to be a good substitute for corn. Chickens grew well on this grain when fed with oats and fattening mashes. They seemed to take on fat and on the whole were plump, but the flesh or skin was deficient in the yellow pigment characteristic of poultry fattened on a corn ration.

The soft corn resulted from the killing frost on September 25. This freeze caught most of the corn before it had been cut and frosted corn, even though nearly ripe, never hardens.

GAME MENACED BY ARCTIC OWLS

A very serious menace to all forms of small game in Michigan has appeared in the form of a heavy migration of Arctc owls—the snowy owl—and other species of predatory birds from the far north, incluring the goshawk.

Walter Hastings, who has been conducting a survey of this migration for the University of Michigan museum, reports to Prof. Norman A. Wood, ornithologist, that he has traced the shooting of at least 100 of these owls in Wayne County alone. One Detroit taxidermist had 50 brought to him for mounting.

"There is no bird more savage than the big Arctic owl," Hastings says. "The goshawk, too, is a murderous bird. It flies through the brush, chasing partridge and rabbits into the thickest cover.

"The snowy owl, appearing in a country where the ground is bare—as was the case in southern Michigan—is so conspicuous that it is likely to be killed quickly, which is a good thing. These birds, coming from a region far beyond civilization, are not afraid of man and the hunter has no difficulty in approaching them.

"All the founds killed, so far as I can learn, were empty of food., The dearth of hares in the north undoubtedly accounts for their flight. They will complicate our grouse problem, I am afraid."

HIGH WATER BLOW TO FALL HUNTERS AFTER JACKSNIPE

Jacksnipe shooting is a sport that did not exist this fall, due to the high water, which so amplified the feeding area of the birds that it was almost impossible to find them.

With bog and their customary feeding sports under water the jacks took to corn fields and low pasture lands, distributing themselves over such a wide area that only a few were found in a given locality. The snipe shooter, therefore, may have tramped miles before he ran into the feeding birds and then the chances were that he discovered but a few of them.

The high water quadrupled potential feeding grounds for the long billed dodgers, as it did for the shoal water ducks, very few of which were killed in marshes, because, like the snipe, they fed in corn fields and remote pot holes, created by the heavy rains.

OLD MEMPHIS CHURCH TO BE COMMUNITY HOUSE

A modern community house will be made from the old Adventist church at Memphis, which has served its people spiritually for the last 62 years. It will be moved to a lot opposite the school house, where it will be fitted out for a gymnasium, as well as for general community use.

The church, which was built in 1864, began with 80 members. Its first trustees were James Potter, Harford Phillips and Mitchell McConnell. The church membership increased for a number of years, then diminished until only about six families now are in regular attendance at services. They expect to build a small modern church.

ORIGIN OF MICHIGAN DEER IS SOUGHT BY DR. DICE

Efforts to determne the origin of Michigan deer and classify them as to species will be made by Dr. L. R. Dice of the University of Michigan museum.

For some time sportsmen have wondered whether deer found in the state are the pure Virginia white-tailed deer or deer of Canadian origin.

Although it is known the Canadian species comes into the state by land and water, the extent of its migration and inter-breedng with native deer, if at all, has never been determined.

MINNESOTA FIRM IS AFTER TIMBER

Logging activities in the vicinity of Munising were given considerable impetus this fall with the establishment of lumber camps at Walsh, an isolated siding on the Duluth South Shore and Atlantic raidroad, by Eklund Brothers and Company, from Minnesota. The event changed the lonely switch on the railroad into a bustling lumber community.

Nearly 70,000,000 feet of marketable timber have been purchased by the Minnesota lumbermen. The timber, which is located a few miles north of the Walsh siding near the Schoolcraft-Alger county border, is mostly birch, maple, beech, hemlock, spruce and balsam, and covers 16,000 acres. It formerly was owned by the Consolidated Lumber company of Manistique, whose logging operations in northern Schoolcraft and Alger counties were terminated many years ago.

Since the company announced its plans lumber jacks from every direction, with their inevitable "turkeys" on their backs, have been drifting into Walsh. Labor is plentiful and the Eklund Brothers will push their logging operations with zeal during the winter months.

LAKES TO GULF ROUTE CALLED BECLOUDED BY PROPAGANDISTS

"Too much propaganda is being put forth by both sides in regard to the St. Lawrence and lakes to the gulf waterways," says City Manager I. R. Ellison of Muskegon, who has been one of the active members of the Great Lakes Harbor Association since its organization.

"The entire question is misunderstood by a great majority because of the great amount of propaganda. The result is that the development of the Great Lakes is being retarded."

"The Great Lakes Harbor Association and those fighting the present diversion of water through the Chicago drainage canal do not oppose the lakes to the gulf waterway project," he said. "The association at its recent meeting in Buffalo not only talked in favor of the lakes to gulf project, but embodied its approval of the waterway in resolutions adopted the final day. The association, while directing the fight against the present diversion of water, is not opposed to the Mississippi Valley development. Once the question of the right of Chicago to divert water from Lake Michigan is decided, the association will meet the supporters of the Gulf project half way."

NO ONE WANTS TO BE COMMERCE BODY HEAD

Harbor Springs Chamber of Commerce is seeking a president, though 86 of the leading business men of the town are members of the organization. At a recent meeting of the chamber every man turned down the honor.

The organization is out of debt and has a snug sum to the good.

The village of Harbor Springs had the same trouble last spring to get a president. No one would allow his name on the ticket, but the name of Allen Angel was written in at election time and he was made president.

SANTA AND WINTER GET HERE NEAR SAME DAY

Santa Claus and winter arrived at about the same time this year. Winter arrived on December 22 at 9:34 a. m., Eastern Standard time. On that morning, the American Nature association says, the sun reached its greatest distance south of the equator and passed through the zenith at all points on the Tropic of Capricorn.

LUMBERING ACTIVITIES IN NORTH BEING PUSHED

Lumber activities in the upper peninsula will be prosecuted this winter with more zeal than ever, according to announcement made by lumber camp operators. The Ford Motor company, it is understood, will buy its logs from small contractors and farmers and the logging business in the vicinity of L'Anse, Baraga and Iron Mountain will be unusually brisk.

In Baraga and Houghton counties the cutting will be heavy, following a sudden brightening in the woods business.

LEAVES LINOTYPE KEYS IN HOPE OF SAVING SOULS

From setting type to saving souls is the record of John L. Losh, former well known upper peninsula linotype operator who recently was ordained a Baptist minister after studying five years to achieve his ambition.

Rev. Losh formerly was a type setter at Sault Ste Marie and saw in this ministry his vocation.

Oriental Magnificence Motif for New Palace

The great wall of China, undoubtedly the greatest of all human structures and the ornate palaces of the Chinese emperors who prevailed in a civilization that was old long before Columbus discovered America, are architectural inspiration of a new motion picture palace of national distinction that is soon to be completed.

It is Grauman's Chinese Theatre and is being built at Hollywood Boulevard and Orchid street, the very center of the film capital of the world. It will have two entrances, one to the forecourt and one to the theatre proper. The forecourt entrance will be through a gate in walls that are forty-five feet high. And the entire forecourt is surrounded by these walls. The lower part of the walls will be lined with tanks built in replica of tropical seas and will be filled with varicolored fishes from the Southern waters.

Inside, the theatre will have an aisle which entirely surrounds the seats. It will be separated from the seats by columns of onyx seven feet in diameter and reaching from floor to high ceiling. Chinese rugs, porcelains, tapestries and other ornate objects from the Orient will complete the decorative scheme and it all will be coupled with the most recent developments of the theatre. The theatre is designed to give the premier performances and runs to each of the two or three greatest pictures of the year. The showman who is building it distinguished himself in the entire world of entertainment when he showed "The Covered Wagon" to three-quarters of a million persons in Los Angeles, a city of a million. Thousands of the patrons were from all over the United States and the world.

Gives "Minstrel Show" on Organ

ELSIE MAE LOOK, member of the staff of the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation station, WLS, Chicago, holds the distinction of being the youngest organist "on the air."

When she was but five years old Miss Look played her first piano selection. She continued at that instrument until she was old enough to make known her preference for the organ. Within a surprisingly short time she had mastered the instrument. Miss Look made her Chicago debut in the radio world and a place was made for her on the WLS staff. There her duties are many. She is at the pipe organ for Sunday noon recitals. Each Tuesday and Saturday noon she is in the studio for the R. F. D. Dinnerbell fun program. Frequently she aids at Lullaby Time, the children's hour. Saturday night finds her filling requests for selections.

Recently another feature has been claiming her services, the "Elsie Mae Minstrels," a feature that takes the listener through the old time black face fun program. Frequently she aids at Lullaby Time, the children's hour.

ear Round Patriots

It is one of the weaknesses of our political system that far too many perfectly respectable citizens limit their interest and participation in politics to election day and the few hectic weeks preceding it. After reading the returns on the morning after election and lamenting that some of the worthy candidates for whom they voted were not victorious at the polls, they lapse into indifference to public affairs.

But while good citizens are far too prone to let the government run itself, for most of the three hundred and sixty five days of the year, as far as they are concerned; not so the spoils politicians who will be found on the job, day and night, during the whole fifty two weeks from January 1 to December 31.

To imagine that we can cure our political ills, with such half hearted activity on the part of the better element, is absurd The big task of running the government in the way it should go demands all the year co-operation of patriotic voters with the candidates whom they have elected to office.

It is a truism to say that citizenship duties do not cease but in reality begin with the marking of the ballot and dropping it into the box at the polls. By this act the voter tactitly goes into partnership with the individuals for whom he votes; while he may not be compelled by law to take an oath of loyalty and faithfulness for his part of the partnership, he is morally bound to give support to those whom he has elected to represent him in legislative halls, in the courts, and in other positions of public trust.

Why wouldn't it be a good idea for every voter carefully to preserve a copy of the ballot he marked and deposited at the polling booth on election day, and from time to time check up on the men whom he helped to "hire," to discover if they were fulfilling their campaign pledges; and if they were not, to look into the reasons for their negligence? There is danger of being too silent a partner to these men back of whom, by our votes, we have agreed to stand. They should be reminded of their campaign promises and not be permitted to forget what is expected of them by their constituents; although we should be always quicker to offer commendation than condemnation.

It should be kept constantly in mind that in a representative form of government, United States Senators, Congressmen, state legislators and other elective public officials are our partners in the important business of steering the ship of state into the harbor of Good Government; and that unless you and I, and other law-abiding Americans lend a hand to assist, they can make little progress and may never reach the desired goal.

Most of our readers will be intensely satisfied with the sentences of Grover Pauter who did the arson work of the past two years and the McClure brothers who attempted to rob and murder Grant Wirt of Churches Corners, and in all probability pulled off the robbery of Chapman's store. It shows justice is terribly swift and sure in Hillsdale county, but there is another chapter to the story. How long will these desperate men remain in to serve out their time? We are afraid that with so much influence outside as is often the case, they will find their way out through the Governor or pardon board before the expiration of the sentences and if they do, there will be let loose a trio of desperate men whose presence in a neighborhood will be dreaded by every law and order loving citizen. Pauter is without doubt a pyro-maniac, as his record shows and the McClures are simply low down criminals who will not stop short of real murder to gain a livlihood. There is no real knowledge of the extent of Pauter's fires. For aught anybody knows he may have kindled some in North Adams. His own story shows he fails to recall all the dastardly deeds he is guilty of, and there is reason to believe he may have covered a lot of territory both sides of Pittsford. At any rate he is in and the country is safe for a time at least.

Death of The Walnut Trees

We are very sorry to learn that the walnut timber of this county is disappearing very rapidly before the axe. If you should visit the N. Y. C. depot you would see piled beside the tracks what looks to be the largest supply of walnut logs ever brought together here and vastly more than you supposed there was to be found anywhere in this vicinity. We were under the impression that all the available walnut timber had been taken away and made into gun stocks during the World war but there still remains some. It is rather deplorable to witness the wholesale destruction of this valuable timber,

The species is slow growing at best and when you consider the number of years required to produce a tree three feet in diameter you will wonder where these logs were picked up and how this timber is left after the inroads that have been made upon it for many years for furniture, gun stocks and cabinet work. It is to be hoped that the re-forestry program which the state of Michigan has inaugurated will be carried through to the finish and vast areas in the northland will be planted with trees of all kinds, and the practice will be kept up until Michigan is again classed as a woodland state. As we have said many times before the reckless wanton waste of our hardwood forests right here in Hillsdale county are to be deplored. Many of our best farms have been practically ruined by some degenerate who imagined he could clean up a big profit from wood and spare logs but found after all was said and done, his loss in ruined washed out fields and drying up of water courses, winter killing of crops and other results has amounted to several thousand dollars.

The Dress Argument

How you regard women's present day fashion in dress all depends upon your point of view and the nature of your criterion. There is one criterion which is the reasonable basis for all judgment in the matter—does the prevailing style in woman's dress render her a healthier, happier woman, and does it make her potentially or actually a healthier, happier mother?

With this single criterion in mind we can judge each item of woman's garb, and decide with reason and finality whether it is good or bad. The short skirt shall first be brought to the bar of judgment. It goes without argument that a heavy skirt puts strain on shoulders and waist, and that the heavy skirt is the long skirt. The short skirt is light and therefore healthful. The short skirt means less dragging through mud and snow, less accumulated dampness, fewer germs brought in from the street and dragged about the floor where babies and children play. The verdict goes unanimously to the short skirt. With the departure of the long, heavy skirt and its heavy lining have gone numerous petticoats that were its accompaniment. Lighter throughout are women's clothes giving her added grace and freedom of movement and giving her muscles opportunity for normal development.

Whether or not the lighter garments of today increase women's susceptibility to colds and other respiratory difficulties has been hotly debated. Regardless of styles of dress, the insurance companies continue to rejoice over the increased expectation of life for both men and women and make no specifications in regard to clothing when insuring women. The death rate from tuberculosis continues to go down. Because of the greater amount of fatty tissue which she possesses, women are less susceptible to changes of temperature than are men, and more resistent to both heat and cold. Lighter garments then would make less difference for her in this respect.

That old-fashioned instrument of torture which women wore, armor plate masquerading under the name of corset, has gone into the discard. Women know that they were painful, and scientific men affirm them to have been injurious to women as individuals.

Five-Day Week And Church

If statements made in the press are true Henry Ford believes that the five-day week will do much towards filling the churches. He is quoted as saying, "The five-day week provides the opportunity for physical recreation on the sixth day and leaves the seventh free for moral and religious observance."

This sounds fine but will it work? We doubt it. The church loving man will go to church on Sunday whether he works five or six days a week. Religion is part of his life. For the people who get into their cars and drive into the country on Sunday for their recreation after laboring six days the five day week will mean one more day of leisure and they can take a drive twice as long as they used to because they have two days instead of one to do it in. They have no thought for church, worldly pleasures having erased it from their mind.

Christians are not given to vandalism so if Mr. Ford's predictions came true willful destruction of property in our parks, along roadsides, and even on farms would show a decline if the five day week was universal. We predict the opposite would happen, because of the non-christian a two day holiday each week instead of one.

We can see where Mr. Ford may benefit from this plan but doubt if the churches will advocate such a plan with the thought that it will increase attendance.

What would be the effect on the world if the farmer adopted a five day week? We are inclined to think that we can but faintly realize what would happen —Michigan Business Farmer.

Elsewhere in this issue is mentioned the Great St Lawrence Waterway, and we have gleaned some statistics in regard to it. It would cost in round numbers 150, millions of dollars to build. Will require construction of nine concrete locks and eight bridges but all together the cost of shipping grain and produce would be materially lowered so that first cost would be a very small item compared to what the works would bring to the farmers of the middle west.

Woodrow Wilson met Edith Bolling Galt first at a tea at the White House, Mrs. Jaffray said. The President introduced Mrs. Galt to Mrs. Jaffray as a "a friend of Dr. Grayson." Dr. Carl T. Grayson, the President's friend and physician, was present.

"It wasn't long before I began to see Mr. Wilson with her." Mrs. Jaffray wrote, "and soon I realized he was deeply in love with this charming widow from 20th Street."

"It was a lovely, old fashioned courtship," the woman who saw so much of it commented. "The President's daughters were delighted with the match. Very soon the girls were calling Mrs. Galt by her first name, Edith."

HOSPITAL GETS NURSES' HOME

General Motors Chief Gives $750,000 to Detroit Institution

Gift of a $750,000 home and school for student nurses at Providence Hospital, Detroit, by Mr. and Mrs. Fred J. Fisher was announced recently. Mr. Fisher is president of the Fisher Body Corporation and prominent in the operation of the General Motors Corporation.

The new building, which is to be called the Burtha M. Fisher Nurses' Home, will be erected on the northeast corner of Wabash and Ferry Park avenues, overlooking the present group of hospital buildings, with which it will be connected by a tunnel under Wabash avenue.

With a frontage of 200 feet on Wabash avenue, the building will be in the modified Romanesque style of architecture, to harmonize with the present group of buildings. The walls of the first story will be of white limestone and the others of special brick with stone trim and cornice.

The main floor will contain a large lobby, music room, private parlor for entertaining guests, a library, offices, study and lecture rooms, two large class rooms, public and private dining rooms and kitchen. A gymnasium, which will also serve as an auditorium seating 500 people, will be equipped in the basement.

The three upper floors will provide accomodations for 72 nurses or facilities for a total enrollment of 216 student nurses. Many student nurses are now living in the main hospital building. When the new quarters are occupied the space for patients in Providence hospital will be increased by 100 beds.

Each of the living floors will have a sitting room and a tea room, while a sun parlor and garden will be built on the roof. Authorities hope to have the building completed within a year. Providence Hospital is operated by the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul. Sister Mary Olympia is the superioress.

PRIEST INSTALLS OFFICERS OF AMERICAN LEGION POS

The Rev. Frank A. Seifert, of Daggett, Mich., acted as installation officer at the annual banquet of Oscar Falk post, No. 146, of the American Legion, in Menominee, recently. The ceremonies were held during the annual banquet of the post, at which more than 150 legionnaires were present. Father Seifert was formerly a department chaplain of the American Legion, and recently elected president of the village where he lives. A few months ago, he was one of the Legion committee sent to France to make preparations for the 1927 convention and for the marking of graves of American soldiers buried there.

She retained charge of the American foundations and paid a number of visits to her children in this country. After months of patient suffering she died in 1885 Her remains were buried in the Conflaris, near Paris, but in 1905, on account of a fear of the vandalism of the French government of that time they were removed to the United States and reburied at Kenwood, near Albany, N. Dairy Notes

Excellent feed, good care, or proper management cannot make a good dairy cow out of a poorly bred "off-type" heifer.

The calves should be fed on whole milk for at least two weeks before giving them substitute, as there is no substitute for milk for the very young calf.

First Veneering

Veneering is the process of coating common wood with slices of rare and costly woods fastened down with glue by screw presses made to fit the surface to be covered. It was first used in the reign of William and Mary, in the last decade of the Seventeenth century. Until that time furniture had been made of solid wood.

Saxophone Rates High,

Among those playing their way through college, the violin comes first in the preference of instruments. The saxophone is second choice of college players, but seventh with girl musicians. Piano is the second favorite instrument with the girls, and third with the boys. Cornet comes fourth in the preference of both the young men and women. Organ is the next favorite with the boys, and flute with the girls. Other instruments in the order of favor with the young men are the trumpet, the trombone, the horn, drum, banjo and mandolin With the girls, it is the drum, clarinet, trombone, harp, banjo, trumpet, organ and mandolin.

A striking fact brought out in the survey was the close relation between music and student leadership. Fully 40 per cent of all the outstanding college students, class presidents, student leaders, etc., are reported to be playing some kind of an instrument.

Music Fights Crime.

That music is the greatest deterrent to crime, is the opinion voiced by the dean of the college of music of New York university, who wrote: "If we were to organize a band or orchestra in every public school, high school, college, university, boys' or girls' club, or place an instrument into the hands of every boy or girl at an age when understanding and appreciation become evident so that the child's mind is aroused sufficiently to make him want to excel in the instrument which he likes best, I believe that we would have, in from ten to fifteen years, from 50 to 75 per cent less dope fiends, criminals and gamblers in the United States."

Henry Ford Experiments

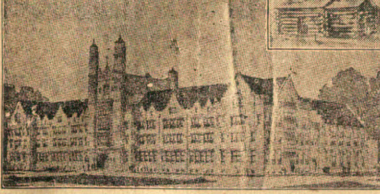
For the past year or two there have been reports that the Ford Motor Company were about to change the design of their cars and build a more standard style in the shape of a transmission and other real attachments to correspond with other manufacturers. The instigators of these reports persist in keeping them going in spite of the fact that denials were forthcoming from the Ford Company. Last week Edsel Ford gave a personal statement concerning the matter which appears to settle it quite definitely. Under the present conditions the Ford company will not change the style of their product, and the "Tin Lizzie" bids fair to be with us for many years to come.

By some investigation we have ascertained this fact: Henry Ford realizing that the little cars which he has built for some years were becoming somewhat obsolete, decided to try some modern form, and to this end put his engineers at work experimenting with a six cylinder engine similar to the six cylinder engine which he invented and built a few years ago before the present little T-model became so popular. One hundred of the new models were built at the shops and put to the test with the result that there has been absolutely no satisfaction from them. It has been found and proven that the six cylinderengine under all circumstances is not practical as an economical proposition. Mr. Ford believes absolutely in gas conservation, and he does not care to put out any form of car which is wasteful. In the course of ten years the gasoline problem is going to be a leading issue. Oil will be scarcer and more expensive than it is today, and altogether the matter hinges on the correct scientific design of the engine. Mr. Ford's engineers report that in their opinion there never will be a successful six-cylinder engine from an economical standpoint and the only way to put up an engine is to either build a four, an eight or a twelve, hence it will be seen the big cars are for millionaires only. This is a surprise to us as we have for several years drove a six and obtained very good service except for gasoline consumption.

They used to say (before sixes were so popular) that nothing would run as well as four cylinders on account of the firing and ignition design. Some manufacturers even claimed to develop more power from four well proportioned scientifically constructed cylinders than any six but the gas bag burst however when the Buick people got right down to business and constructed a six cylinder car. Following their lead others went into the field until today sixes are known the world over for their hill climbing proclivities. Hardly one man in ten who has owned a six of any kind would care to come back to the four, for a steady diet, so it is possible the world at large will just laugh a little a "Uncle Henry's" ideas of economy and roll along quite similar to the past.

We firmly believe however, that the oil and gas situation is going to stick its ugly face into the situation inside of a few years at best, because experts have told us the oil supply in sight is scheduled to last only a minimum at best unless other discoveries of oil fields are made which are not known at present. It is just possible that your "Uncle Henry" is a little further sighted than most men and he is right—at all events the waste of gas these days is terrible, and should be considered by every manufacturer in the world. We understand European manufacturers are and have been for years doing their level best to build economical gas engines, and we hope Americans will follow the good example.

EIGHTY-ONE YEARS MARK NUNS' LABOR



One of the new Buildings of Marygrove College, and the Original.

Eighty-one years ago, in Monroe, Mich., the Rev. Fr. Louis Florent Gilet, C. SS. R., a Belgian missionary to the United States, paused for a moment in his work of caring for ten parishes scattered between Monroe and Adrian and took stock of the educational situation in his territory.

Settlers were coming in by the hundreds, bringing with them many children of school age. A large number of these were Catholics, but there was not a single parochial school in the diocese outside of the city of Detroit. And, there were no nuns available to teach in such schools even if they had existed. The situation called for immediate action.

Father Gilet hastily discarded as impracticable the idea of obtaining nuns from Europe. His next thought was to found a religious order of women himself but this called for extraordinary courage and determination. Both of these qualities the young priest possessed in abundant quantities, however, and in 1845 he founded Michigan's first order of teaching nuns, the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

When it is remembered that today there are over 1,600 members of this order teaching over 50,000 children each year, it is difficult to realize from what humble beginnings this great congregation sprang. The habitation of its first members was the abandoned log hut of some pioneer. Their first school—theirs, because nobody else wanted it—was housed in a similar building.

The original members of the newly-founded order were four pious women, two from Baltimore, Md., one from Grosse Pointe, Mich. and the fourth, the sister of the then mayor of Monroe. Their school was opened Jan. 15, 1846 and from the start it was overcrowded, but hardships and privations failed to deter the Sisters and within a few years this early school was taking in boarders, the forerunner of the present St Mary's College.

For the first few years the newly-tablished nuns were known as the Sisters of Providence and their habit was black. In December, 1847, with the approval of the Rt. Rev. Peter Paul Leffevre, D. D., Bishop of Detroit, they assumed their present title and the color of their habit was changed to blue, in honor of the Immaculate Conception.

The steady growth of the Monroe Sisterhood has been marked by many interesting features which, in fact, fill a good sized book. But perhaps one of the most remarkable facts connected with their history, at least from the human interest standpoint, was the ignorance of Father Gilet of the flourishing condition of the order which he had founded.

After four years spent in Monroe, Father Gilet was recalled to Baltimore and subsequently returned to Europe, where he was able to carry out his intention of joining the Cistercian or Trappist monks, at the Royal Abbey of Notre Dame, Hautecombe, Savey. Here, sequestered from the outside world, he spent the remaining 33 years of his life, holding in turn the offices of Novice Master, Sub-Prior and Abbot.

News of the outside world, even of the religious world, rarely penetrated the confines of Trappist monasteries, hence it is not at all strange that Father Gilet, or Father Mary Celestin, as he had become, failed to learn of the growth and expansion of his proteges. Finally, in 1889, three years before his death, he was informed, through a chance letter sent by one of the Monroe Sisterhood to a relative in another monastery, that his congregation had not only survived the hardships of its early years but had grown to be the largest teaching order in Michigan.

Communication between the aged monk, almost 80 years old, and the Sisters was immediately established, with the result that the Sisters were able to learn from their founder many interesting historical details concerning the first years of their order. Father M. Celestin died in 1892, leaving his worldly goods, a worn rosary, crucifix and a relic of St. John Berchmans, to his spiritual children in Monroe.

During the first eight years of their existence the Sisters Servants received but two novices, their motto being to "make haste slowly." After these first few years had proved the strength of the [illegible], applicants began to be received more frquntly, with the result that, in 1872, the roll of professed nuns numbered 106.

Some of the subjects taught in the earliest schools of the order, set forth in an advertisement of that time, are as follows: "Reading and Writing, in various styles; Gramar, both French and English; Arithmetic; Chronology; Mythology; Polite Literature; Geography; Elements of Astronomy; Natural Philosophy; Domestic Economy; Bookkeeping, by Single and Double Entry; History, Sacred and Profane, Ancient and Modern; Plain and Ornamental Needlework; Beadwork; Tapestry; Lace Work; Embroidery with Gold and Silver Painting; Worsted Flowers; Music, Vocal and Instrumental."

In 1858 a number of the Sisters went to Susquehanna County, Pa., to establish a school at the request of the Rt. Rev. John N. Neumann, C. SS. R., Bishop of Philadelphia. Here they prospered until today they constitute two separate congregations, one having it's Mother house in Scranton and the other in West Chester.

The first parochial schools to be opened by the Sisters in Detroit were in the parishes of St. Joseph's, the Cathedral, and St Anne's which were established about 1861. Schools in Painesville, Ohio and Adrian and Marshall, Mich., were opened at about the same time and then came the older Detroit schools, St. Vincent de Paul's, St Boniface, Our Lady of Help and Holy Redeemer.

At the present time the Sisters conduct 19 parochial schools in Detroit and schools in Ann Arbor, Battle Creek, Benton Harbor, Carleton, Coldwater, Dearborn, Dexter, Emmet, Erie, Flint, Harbor Beach, Ionia, Jackson, Marine City, Marshall, Monroe, Mt. Clemens, Mount Morris, Newport, Pontiac, Port Huron, Redford, River Rouge, Roseville and Wyandotte, besides others outside of the diocese, the college and academy for young women and the Hall of the Divine Child, for little boys, in Monroe.

The members of the Monroe Sisterhood do not concern themselves entirely with primary and academic education. Their college for young women at Monroe was one of the first institutions of its kind in Michigan and the first three buildings for their new Marygrove College, in the northwestern section of Detroit, have just been completed.

Marygrove College, at Monroe, is incorporated under the general laws of the state and has the approval of the State Board of Education, the Catholic Educational Association and the North-Central Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. The Academic department is approved by the State Normal schools, the University of Michigan and the North Central Association. Teacher's life certificates are granted to graduates of the college who have completed the required course in the art and science of education.

The site of the new Marygrove College for young women is a beautifully wooded 80-acre tract in the vicinity of the new grounds of the University of Detroit. On this campus, as now planned, will stand 14 separate buildings. All of the buildings will be of the English Collegiate Gothic style and will be constructed entirely of stone. The towers of the Liberal Arts building will have their roofs of copper which will be left without paint, so that the oxidation may turn them to a beautiful verd antique. A large clock and set of electrically-operated chimes are now being installed in the towers.

The faculty of Marygrove College will include graduates of the Universities of Michigan, Kansas, Pittsburg, and Notre Dame, and the Catholic University of America, as well as lecturers in special courses from the University of Detroit and the Sacred Heart Seminary.

Less than a century has passed since the first Sisters Servants took up their quarters in the little log cabin secured for them by Father Gilet. The founder himself has been dead a little over 30 years, but the congregation has grown to a size and importance undreamed of by the missionary and bids fair to reach a size which even a few years ago would have seemed improbable.

In the death of Sister M. Dorothea of the Monroe order, who died recently at the convent, the community lost a member whose years as a religious extended almost to the days of the founders. She was the only living member who had ever seen Father Gilet, the founder.

Sister Dorothea was born in Monroe county, in 1837. She belonged to one of the pioneer French families and was known to the world as Archangel Jordan. As a little girl she came to St. Mary's when it was in the original log cabin. She entered the community in 1865.

Great Lakes To Ocean Waterway

Herbert Hoover has submitted to the committee appointed for the purpose his report of findings of the St. Lawrence Waterway and any other feasible plan. As we learn by Radio from Detroit Secretary Hoover has designated the St Lawrence Route as by far the best in his judgment and also in the opinion of the engineers on the job. There has been a great propaganda put forward to influence the United States Government to take up the inland route through the State of New York by the way of the Hudson River and Erie Canal. This of course is sponsored by New York City interests, and these interests we will be obliged to fight to the death without doubt. It is of vast importance to the citizens of New York City whether this great International water route passes by their door or runs several hundred miles further north of them. But the great middle west and especially Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin and Illinois Lake states are intensely interested in the project—it means life and fame and commercial success to them.

Without giving the undue credit of personal motive to the man, we might say that Casper J. Lingerman, realtor of Detroit in his weekly talks over the Radio from WJR has awakened considerable personal interest. He is now figuring on organizing his thousands of hearers in this district throughout the states mentioned into a great club to promote the Waterway idea, and aside from personal interest in this we believe the plan is a very good one. There is not a man woman or child in the five states above who would not be personally benefitted by the building of the canal to the Ocean and hence to the whole world. The slogan is "Make every Lake city an Ocean port and it is a fine one. We hope to see the day when ships of all nations will tie up at the municipal docks and terminals of Detroit—and we are optimistic enough to think we shall see it. We have harped it for some years and may be our readers are a little tired of it. You should not be. The day is near at hand when the prosperity of all rural communities in these states actually depends upon the building of the great water route to Europe. We want to see a time when people of Michigan will speak as familiarly of France, Paris London, The Hague, and Liverpool as they now do of New York City and Boston and such a result will follow in the wake of the Canal. There is now a movement in hand to get after the authorities at Washington and compel them to arrange a treaty with Canada whereby the work can begin at once. It develops that the present administration of the Province adjoining the route is now somewhat more favorable, and the public sentiment of the Canooks is far more favorable than during the term of Senator Townsend who tried so hard to bring about the agreement. The money and brains necessary to put the project through are standing ready to begin—and shippers and farmers of the middle west should work like Trojans through their Congressional lobbies to bring about the desired result

Without question it has got to come, but how soon depends upon the perseverance and aggressiveness of the citizens of Michigan. If you can't do anything else write a letter to your Senator at Washington—a thousand letters of this nature would naturally lead that pompous high-hatted individual to see for himself how badly the middle west wants the waterway.

Literary Digest is Slightly Mistaken

In a recent issue of the Literary Digest we notice a reference to J. Wilkes Booth assassin of Abraham Lincoln. The Digest hashes up that old old yarn about Booth escaping and making tracks to Missouri or some other western state and there finishing his life as cabinet maker. The whole business is pure bunk, as anybody knows who is familiar with the history of the case. Some years ago the Dearborn Independent determined to ferrit out the stories of Booth's escape and sent a representative of the company to Missouri and also to the scene of the shooting of Booth on a lonely plantation in the South where he was chased and cornered by Federal cavalry. The Dearborn Independent found that strange character once lived in the town in Missouri as reported but in all respects he differed from the original Wilkes Booth. After so many years had elapsed of course it was rather difficult to trace his career, but people were found there who remembered the circumstances perfectly well. The general opinion of investigators is that the individual was more or less a cracked specimen of humanity addicted to liquor drinking and from a desire for notoriety or from a diseased and imaginative brain he cooked up the yarn about his relationship to the Booth episode, claiming he was a cousin of J. Wilkes Booth and the later was killed in mistake for himself and that he really committed the crime. After investigation of this old man's character and habits it was settled he never was at Washington in his life and in all probability knew nothing of the crime except what he had read and picked up. In the wild and woolly community of the west where he had gone the inhabitants were quite ready to pick up his yarn and no doubt many believed it.

Facts however do not bear it out and other marks on the body of J. Wilkes Booth were not present. Up to a few years ago the actual men who captured Booth were alive and their story is that Booth was wounded in trying to escape the fire which consumed the barn in which he was concealed and was carried to the porch of a near by house where he died. His body was taken north and exhibited on board a moniter for a day or two thence it was buried under the cellar floor of a building, the actual whereabouts of which was known to only one or two men. It was well sprinkled with lime and no doubt disintregated very soon. The Dearborn Independent spent considerable money in running the case to earth, and proof can be had of them at any time of the facts. The Literary Digest is certainly wrong in its statement concerning the so-claimed Booth of Missouri.

House Keeping At The White House

Mrs. Elizabeth Jaffray, who was housekeeper at the White House during four administrations, gives us some of the little intimacies of that establishment, in a story in the Cosmopolitan. She writes that the only expense of the President in running the White House is the food bills.

"During the first four years that I was in the White House," she writes, "President Taft had to pay personally out only the ordinary White House food bills, but the cost of all the State dinners and official receptions. This meant that during the season—from December until February—the bills would amount to more than $2,000 a month. With the coming of the Harding Administration, however the extraordinary entertainment bills were not paid out of the President's own pocket, but out of the President's traveling allowance of $25,000 a year."

She tells how Woodrow Wilson paid, out of his own rather shallow funds, a $250 bill for furnishings for the White House when the Government had no money to pay the bill. And the furnishings, it developed, had really been ordered by Mrs. Taft.

Then she turns to a more serious vein and tells of Wilson keeping a lone vigil at the bier of his first wife for two long nights, refusing solace or company.

CARMELITES ESTABLISH MONASTERY IN DETROIT

Cloistered Nuns Represent Religious Order Dating From Tenth Century

Under the leadership of the Rev. Mother Anna of St. Bartholomew, formerly prioress of the Monastery of Discalced Carmelites at Grand Rapids, Mich., five Carmelite nuns have established a monastery in Detroit. The Sisters were invited to Detroit by the Rt. Rev. Michael J. Gallagher, D. D., Roman Catholic Bishop, and are quartered in a house belonging to the Diocese which stands on the site of the proposed cathedral.

This is the first foundation of the Discalced, or barefoot, Carmelites in this city. The sisters are creating a shrine of Saint Therese, the "Little Flower of Jesus" who was a member of their order. Strictly cloistered, the Carmelite sisters spend much of their time in prayer. They support themselves by needlework, the quality of which is famous throughout the world.

The Carmelites are one of the oldest religious orders in the Roman Catholic church and date at least from the tenth century. Many of the Carmelite nuns in Michigan are refugees from religious oppression in Mexico.

INFIRMARY OPENED AT ADRIAN BY DOMINICANS

Formal opening of the new infirmary for incapacitated Sisters of the Dominican Order marked the annual reception ceremonies held recently at St Joseph's Academy, Adrian. The Rt. Rev. Michael J. Gallagher, D. D., Bishop of Detroit, was in charge of the exercises.

Sixty novices who have completed their two-year novitiate in the order received their habits and 15 young women made their first professions. The Rev. Fr. Peter Esper, of Detroit, was celebrant of the Mass and the Rev. Fr. F. J. Roch, of Cleveland, and the Rev. Fr. Anthony J. Philbin, chaplain of the Academy, were deacon and sub-deacon respectively. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Fr. Vincent R. Burnell, O. P., of Louisville, Ky.

C. OF C. CHAPLAIN HONORED ON EVE OF EUROPEAN TOUR

The Rev. Fr. John A. McClorey, S. J., well known Jesuit pulpit orator and recently appointed Michigan state chaplain of the Knights of Columbus, was the guest of honor at a banquet held in the Detroit Athletic Club on the eve of his departure for a year of study in Europe. The affair was sponsored by a group of the priest's friends. Father McClorey, who has taught philosophy at the University of Detroit for a number of years, was recently granted a sabbatical year to be devoted to study and travel by the General of the Society of Jesus at Rome.

Students as Leaders.

Forty-six per cent of the colleges reported band and orchestra work as part of their school curriculum. Five per cent of the total enrollment of the colleges are members of college bands and orchestras, of which 18 per cent are women students, with the girls playing almost exclusively in orchestras. Leaders for these college bands are drawn for the most part from the faculty ranks, though some colleges use students as leaders and another small group goes outside for leader talent.

Playing in the college orchestra is somewhat more popular than the band with the boys as well as girls. Approximately 10 per cent of college students who play an instrument in the college band or orchestra end up eventually in the ranks of professional musicians.

"Horn Their Way Through."

"Horning one's way through college" compares very favorably with other methods of self-support through the college years, according to the college executives contributing to the survey. Despite the comparatively limited opportunities offered in the average college town, fully one-fourth of all the students playing in the college bands and orchestras are paying for their education with their instruments. Students' earnings range all the way from board and room, two-dollar-an-hour tuition fee, and up to two thousand dollars a year. Twelve per cent of the college executives in the survey are of the opinion that playing one's way through school pays better than other means; another 12 per cent thought it offered an easier way to make one's way through, while a goodly number of others said that it interfered least with the students' school work.

EDUCATOR WRITES HISTORY OF FAIR

From the queer, faraway days back in 1849 when the chief attractions of a fair was the plowing contest and neither merry-go-rounds nor soft drink stands were to be found on the grounds, down to 1911, the history of Michigan's annual all-state fair, with all its triumphs and its occasional setbacks, is recorded in one of the most interesting documents on record, recently prepared by Ira H. Butterfield, 85-year-old father of Kenyon L. Butterfield, president of Michigan State college.

Butterfield is a native of Michigan and has spent nearly all his life in this state. In a preface to his "History of the Michigan State Agricultural Society," he states that he has seen every fair since 1854, with the exception of four, and has exhibited sheep and sattle at nearly all of them. He served as member of the executive committee, secretary, president and vice-president, and is well acquainted with most of the transactions connected with the management of the state fair.

MICHIGAN ELEVEN IS HIT HARD BY GRADUATION

While the Big Ten is still wrangling over the spectacular close of the football season, Coach Edwin Mather, the "skipper" of Michigan's basketball destinies, who brought a tie for the conference title to Ann Arbor last winter, is quetly preparing for a strenuous program.

Michigan, along with Illinois and Purdue, is hard hit by graduation and ineligibilty, not in numbers, but in quality. The loss of Captain Dickp Doyle, all-conference center, means more to Michigan than the loss of two or three mediocre men. Doyle's all round ability at the tip-off position and at back guard made hm the most valued player in the Big Ten. Besides Doyle, Michigan has lost Reece and Ginn, both letter men last year, by ineligibility.

TIMBER WOLF, FIRST SEEN IN YEARS IN OTSEGO IS KILLED

A timber wolf was killed in Otsego county by Clark Noirot and George Jazinski, tow residents of Gaylord. Old settlers say that it is the first wolf of this kind ever seen south of the straits.

The two hunters were a few miles northeast of Gaylord when their two dogs struck the trail of the wolf and immediately became frenzied. The wolf was soon sighted and brought down by a shot. The dogs attacked him, as the shot was not fatal, and the wolf put up a real fight against the dogs. The hunters finally dispatched him. The ride of the animal measured five feet from tip to tip.

THRILLS GO WITH BAG'S RECOVERY

Recovery of the balloon which slipped out his hands October 18, in the mountains of Pennsylvania provided almost as many thrills for Dr. G. M. LeGallee of Detroit as the flight that preceded the loss. The balloon is now on its way back to Detroit, and Dr. LeGallee is a qualified balloon pilot as a result.

A telegram from Wayne Gardner and Willard Route of Roaring Branch, Pa., informed Dr. LeGallee that they had found the balloon while hunting on the top of a Pennsylvania mountain near the village, and he went there immediately to recover it. He spent a whole afternoon trying to find enough men to assist in gettng the bag and basket out of the woods, but with little success. The next day, however, when he started for the spot, 26 men went with him, in wagons and automobiles to the section of the road nearest where the bag was found.

His assistants apparently knew the woods because most of them carried axes. By hard climbing through thick brush, they reached the balloon and found the basket lodged high up in the branches of a tree, with the bag lying partly on the ground and partly draped over the branches of another tree. There were several holes in the bag, and where it lay on the ground, mice had eaten other hols in the fabric. Nothing was missing from the basket but the pilot's camera.

PETER'S ADVENTURES IN ANIMAL LAND

By FLORENCE SMITH VINCENT

Grumpier and grumpier and grumpier grew Puss-Cat, until Peter, tired of listening in her growls, turned his attention to the merrymakers. Puss-Cat, finding it far from interesting complaining to thin air and soothed by the music of the fiddle, closed her eyes and, although it was the very last thing she had intended to do, fell into a sweet cat-nap.

So it happened that neither Puss-Cat nor Peter nor any of the merrymakers saw four gray mice creeping out of the shadows. Each padded along as softly as only a mouse can, and if anybody had been watching he would have noticed something queer in the gait of the last three mice—a jerky stop after every few steps, a sudden lifting of three heads into the air, a twitching of three pairs of whiskers—and, looking closer, he would have discovered that the three mice in the rear had no tails to wriggle nor no eyes with which to see.

But the fellow that led the procession was a fine mouse, every inch of him, from the tip of his tail to the top of his head. His eyes sparkled like small diamonds in the dark and his tail was as long and furry as any mouse's tail has a right to be. And be sure he carried his tail with care lest it should touch a leaf and make a noise that would, perhaps, wake Puss-Cat.

Silently, slyly, surely the bright-eyed mouse and the three that could not see crept upon the sleeping cat. At! too bad no one was watching to see the strange sight!

Now the four were under Puss-Cat's very nose. Perhaps Poss-Cat thought she smelled a rat (or a mouse), for her whiskers trembled and she growled a little growl. Te hearts of the four mice must have turned over with fright, but they held their ground, though they were all ready to run like the wind if Puss-Cat woke up. But she didn't. If anything, after that faint growl she slept more soundly than before.

Silently the first mouse who could not see crouched down beside her. Slyly the second mouse without his eyesight climbed upon the first one's back. Surely the third mouse with neither eyes nor tail climbed upon the second. Upon the back of third crawled the mouse whose eyes sparkled like small diamonds in the dark. And from the front paws of this last mouse dangled something.

Straight upon his hind feet stood that daring mouse and then—would you believe it—stretched out his front paws as far as they would reach toward Puss-Cat. Silently, slyly but surely over the head of his sleeping enemy that mouse slipped a noose! Then before one could have said "Jack Robinson" the little mountain of mice fell apart. Each mouse took to his heels and scampered off to safety.

Next—"Tinkle, tinkle, little bell."

To sit on a husband is not the best way to hold him down.

FIRE FAILS TO HIT TOWN PROSPERITY

When the people of Onaway stood in a roaring blizzard last January and watched the flames sweeping like fiends of destruction through their largest factory, they thought their town was doomed.

"Might as well begin looking for a job somewhere else," said the workmen.

Four lives were lost in the fire, which did a million dollars' damage to the plant of the American Wood Rim Co. Eight hundred men were thrown out of work. Officials of the company announced that a new factory would be built in Alma. The town of more than 2500 popuation seemed headed for extinction.

Onaway had suffered a terrific blow but her spirit was not broken. Her business men took stock of their situation, perceived the soil resources of the surrounding country and began the task of reconstruction.

Today the population is still more is 69 per cent of what it used to be, than 1500, enrollment in the schools and bank deposits are about 70 per cent of the former total. Business men expect agriculture to give the town a greater prosperity, within a few years than even the factory did.

The fire accelerated a transition in the Onaway district which is inevitable in northern Michigan; which began some years ago and will continue many years more.

Once the principal mainstay of the section was timber. Then, as the forests were lumbered off, land clearing was undertaken and the forest lands were converted into farms.

PRICE OF DINNER, CLUB INITIATION

Full membership in a country club for $1.50 a year. Yes, it's a fact that that is just what it will cost to belong to the Shiawassee County Conservation association and enjoy all the privileges of its $15,000 club house just completed, and its spacious grounds. And in the bargain you will get a banquet once a year.

As a matter of fact, one buys a ticket to the annual banquet for a dollar and a half and that entitles him to membership in the association and gives hi mand the members of his family the privileges of the clubhouse and grounds.

It is the aim of the organization to make its organization the most democratic in the county. There are members of the organization who are reputed to be worth a million, yet they will rub shoulders at the banquet table, and while away the hours at the clubhouse, with bench workers from the factories. The cost of the membership was set so low that anyone with a love for the things the association stands for, can afford to belong to it.

The clubhouse and grounds are located on the bank of the Shiawassee river, five miles north of Owosso.

MT. CLEMENS BANKER OBTAINS RARE DOLLAR

Henry "Tom" Stephens, millionaire banker, lumberman and traveler, and president of the First National bank of Mt. Clemens, sends word from the Pacific coast that he has acquired one of the rare silver dollars of the 1804 coinage, which is quoted at a premium in excess of $1,000. Only four silver dollars of that issue were coined. One was lost when a noted Turkish wrestler drowned during an ocean trip; one is owned by Rizad Bey, the shah of Persia, and the other by a Philadelphia man.

ARTIFICIAL LIGHT INCREASES EGGS

Artificial lighting as a means of increasing egg production has proved its value at Michigan State College. It is used in the college poultry plant and in the annual International Egg Laying Contest conducted at the college.

"This method is no longer in the experimental stage," says C. M. Ferguson, professor of poultry husbandry. "In fact, the practice os conscidered essential to high egg production.

"The basic principle back of increased production by artificial illumination is physiological and not psychological. It merely permits the bird to consume enough food to meet the demands of the body and leave sufficient reserve for the production of eggs.

"The hen requires from three-quarters to four-fifths of all the food she consumes for body maintenance. This leaves her with a narrow margin for the production of eggs. The average hen does not have sufficient digestive capacity to take care of an excess for egg production when her feeding time is limited, as it is at theis time of the year."

TIMBERLAND ON LAKE BOUGHT FOR SCOUTS

Purchase of approximately 45 acres of second growth timberland on the shores of beautiful Reddy lake, several miles south of Munising, has been approved by the Munising Rotary club. The site, to be taken over from Charcoal Iron Company of America as soon as a representative of that firm presents the club with a deed to the property, will be donated to the Boy Scout organization of Munising for use as a permanent summer camp.

BIG RAPIDS IS BIDDING FOR GREENVILLE SPUD SHOW

Greenville, self-styled "potato capital" of Michigan, may lose the Western Michigan Potato Show, which has been held there for two years. Big Rapids is bidding for the next show.

Montcalm County growers, however, do not propose to lose the show unless they can be convinced it will be for the betterment of the potato industry.

The invitation to hold the 1927 show at Big Rapids came from the Big Rapids Exchange Club, which has offered to underwrite the show and furnish and exhibit hall.

VELTET PEAK OF FASHION'S FAVOR

Fabrically speaking, Michigan women's minds run to a single channel this season, namely, velvet. Velvets may literaly be worn from morning until night, since many of the most effective sports outfits, as well as afternoon and evening ensembles, are fashioned of this rich material.

For the morning jog, sports outfits consisting of the two-piece velveteen jumper-frock and the matching fur-trimmed coat are most popular. Afternoon finds the softer chiffon and transparent velvet gowns and ensembles usually trimmed with metallic touches or fur.

Evening sponsors velvet gowns of cobweb weight with no trimming other than clever drapery, or velvet gowns that are gorgeously beaded in crystals or sparkling brilliants. Fringe is another manner of trimming the velvet gown of formal evening type. Usually the evening gown of velvet is accompanied by a matching wrap that is fur-trimmed or by a fur wrap that is lined with velvet matching the gown.

Velvet has added a richness to the evening mode which is beyond description. For day wear velvet turbans, velvet pumps, velvet-cuffed gloves, velvet pocketbooks, etc., also lend a hand in asserting that velvet is the fabric of the elite and of the multitudes.

COLLEGE OF MINES TO PUBLISH YEAR BOOK

A year book, novel among college publications, the second issue of its kind, will be published by the student organization of the Michigan College of Mines at Houghton. It is the "Keweenawan," significant of the Keweenaw peninsula—the famed copper country of Michigan, in which the only mines of native copper on this continent are found.

Truth comes and goes, but bunk goes on forever.

DULCIMETER, PATTERN OF CENTURY AGO, SENT FORD

A dulcimer, fashioned after one more than 100 years old, has been sent to Detroit for the approval of Henry Ford, who last winter started a revival of the old-time square dances, bringing back the old-time fiddlers and dulcimer players of the last century.

Charles F. Peterson, a Muskegon resident and former dulcimer player, wrote to the motor king asking if he would be interested in dulcimers patterned after the old one he owned. Ford replied, requesting photographs and prices of the instrument which "Charley" said he could make at the rate of three a week. The pictures were taken and sent to Detroit, with the result that a second request asked that one of the dulcimers be sent on approval.

DUCK'S TAMED BY COLD AND HUNGER

When snow and ice seal up their food supply, wild ducks, particularly young mallards, sometimes starve to death. The birds become separated from the older heads of the migrating flocks, are forced to fall back upon their limited experience n foraging, and fly from one frozen pot hole to another until they drop from exhaustion. In such instances the young mallards have suffered a loss of instinct—they do not know enough to fly South.

Usually after the freezing of a large marsh mallards can be flushed out of heavy tufts of grass, where they have sought shelter from the weather. Though there is no food for them in the vicinity, the ducks tenaciously cling to what was formerly an abundant feeding ground and can not be driven away. Hunters traversing the frozen marshes with dogs catch these lost and weakened mallards alive. If the birds flush, they do so at exceedingly close range, and should the hunter miss them, they fly but a short distance before alighting. Sometimes they alight upon the snow.

Mallards made desperate by hunger, have been known to drop into a farmer's back yard for chicken feed. The famished ducks waddle among the chickens, snatching what corn or grain they can, oblivious to the presence of humans. When the ducks are driven to such an extremity they are usually shot by their surprised host. One farmer told how he killed a brace of green-head drakes by shooting out of his kitchen window.

An optimist becomes a pessimist when he gets fired instead of getting a raise.

HIGHWAY OPENING RECALLS OLD DAYS

In the little Irish Hills tavern, 75 miles east of Sturgis, 125 men gathered for a banquet to mark the dedication and formal opening of the famous old Chicago trail, M-23, between Detroit and Chicago, now completly paved. The company was vaguely reminiscent of the days when merry assemblages "swapped yarns" about the dinner tables of the ancient wayside inns that once flourished along the route.

Chicago road winds through beautiful wooded areas, across fertile farm lands, past mysterious swamps, by scores of magnificent lakes, up and down hills and through the streets of thriving towns, traversing a time-worn path across one of the most historic and scenic sections of Michigan.

The Irish Hills comprise the most beautiful area. They lit about midway between Detroit and Sturgis, or 75 miles from the former city. After passing through them, towns follow in swift succession until the traveler reaches the beautiful St. Joseph valley. Then come South Bend and Chicago.

One of the historic spots on the highway is Cambridge Junction where are situated the two old Walker Taverns. The oldest and the most important is a frame structure standing on the north side of the road. Across the road is one of brick. Both are full of pioneer furniture, old crockery and the countless relics of an earlier day. The wooden building was built in 1833 by Sylvester Walker, a member of the state legislature. The brick building was erected in 1854.

LAKE-FILLED STATE

With our thousands of lakes and streams in Michigan we are fortunate in not having to depend on artificial waterways for fishing and recreation. In Nebraska and Kansas and other semi-arid states they must dam the water back to form lakes.

PORCUPINE FOUND IN PLENTY NORTH

Deer hunters, who spent two weeks in northern Michigan this fall, htd plenty of time to study the porcupine. The hardwood forests of the upper peninsula are full of these interesting creatures and to which one or two feeding in the tree tops or ambling along the ground is indeed a treat. In appearance they are not greatly unlike a cub bear, particularly when high in a tree top at the close of day.

The Michigan porcupine is not a timid animal, nor is it at all aggressive. It is true it is armed with long, keen quills, but it is an armament of defense and he desires to go his inoffensive way in peace. When he feels that danger threatens he slowly raises his quills, humps up with nose down low. Ordinarily when walking his quills lie flat against his body, rattling as he walks his way.

NON-PROFESSIONAL VOW URGED AT GRID SESSION

It is the concensus of the National Student federation meeting at Ann Arbor that college football players should be made to sign a pledge that they will not play professional football until their class has graduated.

The students do not believe that professonal football is essentially a menace, but believe college players in loyalty to their school shoud sign such a pledge.

The document states that college athletes taking part in any branch of professional sports should be automatically barred from all college athletics.

DREAMS CALLED BUNK AS SYMBOLISTIC OF FATE

The Freudian interpretations of dreams through systems of symbolism are "a tremendous amount of nonsense," Prof. John F. Shepard of the department of psychology, University of Michigan, declared in a lecture on "The Nature of Sheep."

Prof. Shepard dealt another body blow to recent psychological theory when he said, "There is no evidence that the normal person has any subconscience. The only evidence of it, is in abnormal or hysterical persons."

Hysterical, he explained, he used in the medical sense to mean persons equipped with a Jekyll and Hyde double personality. Other folks, he insisted, needn't worry themselves about the subconscious as a personal matter.

A seedless apple tree, worth thousands of dollars, perhaps millions, to fruit growers of Canada, is said to be bearing fruit this year at Abbotsford, near Montreal. The apple, elongated like a sheep's nose, has neither core nor seeds and is propagated exactly like the seedless orange.

A "porcupine cork," to guard bottles containing poisons, has been devised. It is fitted with sharp glass spikes which bristle in every direction.

Fashions are now displayed on mechanical dolls that can walk with quite a natural grace like living models.

TABLET MARKS SITE OF IRON'S DISCOVERY BY INDIAN IN 1845

Under the roots of an unturned pine stump within the limits of the present city of Negaunee, several miles west of Munising, the first discovery of iron ore in the Lake Superior region was made in 1845 by an Indian, according to the tablet of the Jackson monument, a huge cone of iron ore set over the spot where the first iron is said to have been found.

Discovery of the initial workable deposit of ore is attributed to two white men, S. T. Carr and E. S. Rickwell, who in the summer of 1845 first visited the Lake Superior iron ranges in company with P. M. Everett, who led a party of pioneers into the wild district.

The deposit unearthed by the white visitors resulted in the construction of the Jackson mine, which has long since been worked out and deserted. The crumbling timber in the mine structure bears mute testimony to the enterprise of the early iron miners, who worked in the region when civilization was just securing a strong foothold.

Progress in the mining operations was slow and difficult for several years, although ore was first mined in the year following its discovery. The construction of the ship canal through the St. Mary river near Sault Ste Marie, and the building of a railroad to "Jackson Mountain," as the rocky highland then was called, augmented the out put of the mine, and led to the huge mining operations which are now one of Michigan's principal industries.

FORD MAKES MEN MONEY, SAME TIME

The man is the thing. That aptly states the motive of Henry Ford in establishing, in 1916, the Henry Ford Trade School at Highland Park.

To prepare mechanics and department executives—possibly a future president of the Ford Motor Co.— the Ford Trade School takes boys from 12 to 15 years of age and keeps them on the job until they are 20. There are 1,600 boys in the school today, and a waiting list of more than 4,000. It is popular with industrially minded boys.

When a lad has completed that course creditably, if there is anything about any part, chemical element, structural strength, construction, design, manufacture, or even the rebuilding of a Ford car you want to know, ask the boy. He will tell you.

And what does it cost the Ford company to keep these 1,600 boys at work in the Trade School? Nothing—except the capital invested in buildings and fachines, which are loaned to the school. That is, the Ford Motor Co. pays out $100,000 a year for hot lunches for these boys; $900,000 a year in scholarships to the boys; $500,000 a year for pay of the 125 instructors and for upkeep of buildings and equipment.

But the Ford Motor Co., according to Frederick E. Searle, superintendent of the school, gets back an average of $1,000 from each boy in the school every year, in Ford automobile and tractor parts, tools, designs and other equipment, all credited to the school at regular shop cost rates for these finished parts.

STATE GAME REFUGE IS ESTABLISHED AT TAWAS

Through the co-operation of the United States Forest Service and the State Conservation Department, a game refuge has been established in the Tawas Division of the Michigan National Forest. The refuge comprises approximately 7300 acres.

This game refuge has been under consideration for some time.

The area within the boundaries contains a portion of Silver Creek, Gordon Creek, and Buck Creek and all of Station Creek.

Examination of Immigrants Abroad Declared Success

By HARRY E. HULL

Comm. Gen. of Immigration

Harry E. Hull, commissioner-general of immigration since June 1925, has been engaged in public life for many years. Beginning his political career as an alder man at Williamsburg, Ia., in 1887 he became successively mayor of that city, from 1889 to 1901, postmaster from 1901 to 1914, and in 1915 a member of Congress. The last named position he held until 1925 when he was installed as commissioner-general of immigration. Mr. Hull was born near Belvidere, N. Y., March 12, 1864. He was educated in the public schools at Cedar Rapids, Ia., and before entering public life engaged extensively in the grain business at Williamsburg.

Aliens debarred from entering the United States during October, 1926, numbered 1,566, but only 212 of these were rejected at the seaports of entry, the remaining 1,354 having been turned back at the land boundaries.

At New York, our principal seaport and where the bulk of the immigration from overseas continues to land, 35,014 aliens sought admission this month and 91 were debarred, or only 3 out of every 1000 applicants. Most of the 91 aliens were stowaways and seamen seeking permanent admission to the United States without first obtaining visas from American Consuls. At the same port during the flood-tide immigration before the World War the ratio of rejections was over 16 per thousand seeking admission.

The system of examining aliens abroad is now almost 100 per cent perfect. Comparatively very few of those arriving with quota immigration visas fail to gain admission to the United States.

In October last, 15,500 quota immigrants with visas arrived at New York and only six of these were found inadmissible under the general immigration laws, or four rejected out of every ten thousand arriving.

In the interests of humanity the nearer to their homes that such inadmissible classes are turned back the better.

At the same time that the examination of aliens overseas has practically eliminated the inadmissable class arriving at our seaports, the activities of the immigration border patrol has kept the smuggling of aliens across the land borders within very narrow limits. The border patrol is at present divided into eleven districts; six of which districts are along the Canadian border; three along the Rio Grande; and two along the coast and Gulf of Mexico.

Thus far the border patrol has not only checked the entry of aliens, but it has given important assistance to other arms of the government and has aided the enforcement of the customs, narcotic and liquor laws.

QUIT AS LABORERS FOR $2,000 PAY

This is the story of 22 Detroiters, only a month ago common laborers at the Ford Motor Co.'s River Rouge plant, who signed a contract last week for a musical act in the New York Hippodrome till the end of the season, at a salary of $2,000 a week.

Among the numerous foreign colonies, which compose a considerable part of Detroit's population, one of the most nteresting is the Russian colony in River Rouge. It has at least three claims to distinction. It is the youngest; it has the greatest number of highly educated and titled personages; it is, without doubt, the most conservative.

Composed of the latest crops of Russan emigrees and refugees, it contains former noblemen, army officers, college professors, students and what not—all reduced to the common denominator of Ford laborers.

The high positions many of them occupied in the past, still makes them live, at least mentally, in that life. To them reality is a dream, while the dreams about things gone by are regarded as the real things. Hence their comparative imperviousness to things American and their general conservatism.

Last spring one of these laborers, Vladimir Bibikoff, having tired of the endless discussions about "What Gen. Wrangle Might Have Done," or "What Admiral Kolchak Should Have Done" under certain circumstances, decided to drown his sorrows in the musc of his old balalaika, which has had not touched for many years.

Among the roomers in the Bibikoff home (his father Ilarion Ilar ionych Bibikoff, also a laborer at Ford's formerly was the attorney general of the Russian province of Minsk), he found several followers. Withn a short time, the Bibikoff house became the center of a group of balalaika players. Morning, day and night, in accordance with the system of shift work at the River Rouge plant, there was someone practicing.

The group grew. Dumbas, a Ukrainian string instrument, were added to the balalaikas, a Russian string instrument. Valerian U. Shishko, before the war and the revolution a professional balalaika player, joned the group and soon became its leader. In Ivan N. Izmailov, a former Russian sailor, with a voice of a fog horn, the group found a solo singer.

Early last month the party left for Pittsburgh. Their four weeks "trial" at the Great theater turned out to be such a success that last week they signed up with the Hippodrome to play till the end of the season at $2,000 a week.

HUGE RACCOON BATTLES CAPTOR ON GRAND RIVER

A large basswood tree, overhanging the banks of the Grand River near Delta, was discovered to be the home of one of the largest raccoons ever captured in that section. The animal weighed 35 pounds and before being taken by Frank Hughes, a painter, of Lansing, was able to make a mess out of its captor's thumb.

Rubberized wallpaper has been invented which may be washed or disinfected. The new covering is used in hospitals and public buildings.

SALMON HATCHED FOR STATE WATER

Interesting experiments in the propagation of land locked salmon have been carried on by Philip G. Zalsman, superintendent of the Grayling Fish Hatchery.

A large number of land locked salmon have been planted in Michigan waters and but few have ever been seen since. Occasionally some one claims to have caught one of these fish but it is a question whether they were land locked salmon as very few people in Michigan know them when they see them.

In the fall of 1915 the State Fish commission received a supply of land locked salmon eggs from the State of Maine. These were hatched in state hatcheries and the fry planted in several lakes and streams. Mr. Zalsman secured 20 salmon eggs and when hatched placed the fry in one of the ponds with brook trout. After two years there were 10 salmon. These were watched annually for the past 10 years. The first fish come to maturity in 1925 and that was a male. None of the females were ready to spawn at that time. The milt from the male land locked salmon was used for impregnating the eggs of brook and brown trout eggs. Soon after the brook trout eggs hatched the fry died, but those of the brown trout lived and the fry placed among the brook trout fry and have been looked for since.

Six of the original land locked salmon are still living—four males and two females. The males and one female matured this fall and 700 eggs were taken from the one female.

TRAITS DISTINGUISH FLYING WILD DUCKS AT GREAT DISTANCE

The experienced duck shooter can identify wild ducks in flight at a distance of a quarter of a mile or more. Though this seems different of accomplishment, it is easy, for the 20 or so species of ducks that are indigenous to Michigan are recognized by their flight, shape, speed, their circling,and pitching, in the same manner that the ordinary citizen recognizes a friend at a distance by his dress or a peculiarity in his gait.

The only ducks difficult to tell apart are the wood duck and the hooded merganser, according to Robert Lambert, conservation officer in the St. Clair Flats region. The reason is that both are tree ducks, have the same shape, the same white markngs underneath and the same spiny tail feathers. Their flight is about the same, according to Lambert. At a short distance the two species may easily be separated from one another, providing they are resting upon the water, but when they are in the air, this is very hard, Lambert says.

Bluebills may easily be identified by their markings. The head of the drake is black, that of the female is brown, their breasts are pure white, their wings barred with white and ash.

ISABELLA COURTHOUSE ON GIFT LAND COST $150

For 16 years Isabella County did business in a $150 court house, built on a gift plot. It was the county's first court house, and served from 1860 to 1876. The five acres on which it was built was donated by David Ward, a lumberman of Saginaw. E. I. Arnold erected the frame building, which was replaced in 1876 by a brick structure, still in use. The original Court House Square of five acres has dwindled to one city block. When the first court house was built there were 1,441 persons on the census rolls, half of them Indians.

TWO OPEN DATES ON 1927 GRID SCHEDULE OF MICHIGAN STATE

Six games and two open dates are on the Michigan State college football books for 1927 so far. Coach Ralph H. Young announced that State would play eight games nevt fall, but only six had been definitely arranged.

Only two teams that State played last fall will be met next season. Kalamazoo college, the schedule opener, and the University of Michigan, are the two teams remaining on the list from the 1926 schedule. New comers are Ohio university of Athens, Ohio, Cornell college of Iowa, University of Detroit and Albion college. Cornell and Ohio university never played State in football. Detroit and Albion are foes of other days.

The schedule: September 24, Kalamazoo college; October 1, Ohio university; October 8, University of Michigan at Ann Arbor; October 15, Cornell College of Iowa! October 22, open permanently; October 29, Detroit; November 5, open; November 12, Albion; November 12, open.

MOTORS AID FIGHT TO CLEAR ROADS

The sleigh bells of other winters have given way to the hum of the motors on the Michigan highways. So it is that the new form of transportation has made it necessary in Michigan, the automobile producing state of the country, to keep the highways open and to wage a constant fight with the northeast gale and the mountains of snow, which in years gone by have made even transportation by the old methods of the cutter and sleight difficult, if not at times impossible.

The highway forces of the state are mobilized and prepared for the gale, which sweeps across the state piling huge drifts across the countless miles of concrete roads. From now until next March, and possibly April, the entire machinery of the state as well as that of the county highway departments and individual agencies, will be given over to the great task of keeping highways cleared of snow and traffic moving.

The State Highway Department, according to B. C. Tiney, maintenance engineer, plans to keep a total of 5,704 miles of trunk line highway cleared of snow this winter. This includes 4,751 miles in the Lower Peninsula and 953 miles in the Upper Peninsula.

The total distance kept open last winter was 4,061 miles and the cost of it averaged $44 per mile.

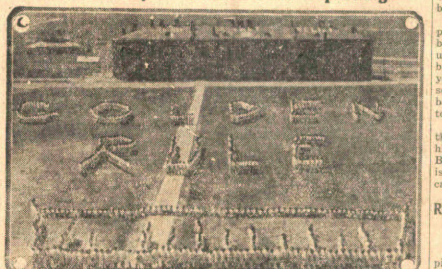
MOOSE SAVED FROM DEATH IN LAKE AS MARINERS SEE HIM

A bull moose tonight roams the wilderness on Round Island nibbling at the frozen herbage and thinking, if his average instincts have not entirely obliterated the incident, of the five men who, at the risk of their own lives, rescued him from a watery grave after hours of futile struggle and hoisted him on Round Island.

Five men of the light-house tender Clover saw the animal struggling in the icy water. They put off in a small boat and came along side while the moose, without fear permitted them to guide him toward the shore. The animal was caked with ice so that he appeared wile a mass of icicles.

First Officer Eckel and Assistant Engineer Handman, of the Clover, directed the work. So exhausted was the big animal that he was unable to walk ashore and the five men pulled him up, spread their coats over him, applied artificial respiration until he could move about.

Quake Destroys "Golden Rule Orphanage"



CABLED dispatches from Armenia indicate that "Golden Rule Orphanage," one of the Near East Relief institutions in Leninakan, formerly Alexandropol, Armenia, has been destroyed by the series of earthquakes that cost hundreds of lives and made thousands of persons homeless.

The above picture was taken a short time before the earthquake and was intended in the nature of an appeal to the people of America to observe International Golden Rule Sunday again this year in order that funds might be provided for tne maintenance of the orphanage.

The building in the picture has been wrecked and the six hundred children who framed the message are living in tents with snowstorms raging and the temperature at zero.

More than a million dollars will be required to aid the earthquake victims and to care for the 9,000 children in Near East Relief care in Leninakan until June.

To aid them people are asked to observe Golden Rule Sunday by serving the simple menu of a Near East Relief orphanage in their homes and then contributing to the organization at 151 Fifth avenue, New York City.

Official reports confirm a total of at least 500 dead, 80,000 homeless, the destruction of 12,000 homes, much property and a large part of the country's food supply. Again the Armenians win their sad distinction to the title of the "martyr nation." But already the work of reconstruction has commenced, under American leadership.

CANADA GOOSE IS WISEST GAME BIRD

There isn't a wiser bird that flies than the Canada goose. And there isn't a game bird that is as hard to knock down or causes the hunter as much physical discomfiture as this honker of the deep waters and wheat fields. Proof of this is written all over the winter wheat fields of the Thumb district, lying adjacent to Lake Huron, where, every morning between daybreak and 10 a. m., the geese come hurtling in from the open waters of Lake Huron to feed at the expense of the farmers.

From the first week in November until everything freezes so tight that there isn't a possible chance for further forage, the Canadas stay in Michigan. They far outstay the canvasbacks and redhead ducks and are the last of the migratory game birds to wend south.

Goose hunting, as carried on throughout the Thumb district, is far different from what it was when spring shooting was permissible. It is not a water sport any longer. It is upland shooting in the same sense as the hunting of plover or quail, differing only in method.

BELDING MAN IS NAMED FOX BREEDERS' HEAD

Albin Johnson of Belding was elected president of the Michigan Fox Breeders' association at the annual meeting. He succeeds B. J. McGee, who has headed the organization for several years. Mr. McGee was named a vice president. Charles Bovay of Jackson was elected secretary and treasurer.

Directors are William Addison, Jackson; Dr. A. Moore, Cadillac; David Murray, Traverse City; John Sandval, Galesburg, Claud Parkhurst, Spring Lake, and J. H. Hudson, Big Rapids.

More than 3,000 pelts were produced on Michigan fox farms this year, it was asserted, the number of farms having increased from 160 to 216 in the last 12 months. Michigan is considered the leading state in fox farming.

MEMORY TRICKEY; HOOTCH BURIED IN WALL 60 YEARS LOST

Sixty years age Harvey Acker, a pioneer stone and brick mason of Ingham county, placed a quart bottle of hard cider in the wall of a busness building in Mason, then under construction. Mr. Acker, who died at the age of 92, a short time ago, and other masons working with him on the building had been given a small keg of cider, probably to stimulate the building's advancement.

Acker 60 years ago was predictng prohibition, believing it would come before his death as a national measure. "If this building isn't destroyed by an earthquake,' said the then young builder, "this stuff will be seasoned in 50 years and some dry neighbor may find it when the buiding is torn down."

Mr. Acker imparted the secret of the concealed bottle just previous to his death to his son-in-law, Theodore Bortle, of Mason. But Mr. Bortle, who is now in his eighties, forgot the location of the building and the wall.

RESERVE MATERIAL LACK HAMPERS ALMA QUINTET

No Michigan Intercollegiate championship is being seen for Alma college basketball team the year, but apparently Alma will have sufficient strength to cause more or less worry in the M. I. A. A. ranks when the season gets under way.

With not a single veteran left from last winter little hope is being held that a new team can be whipped together that will be able to be up there in the fight for the championship, even though some of the new materal this year is apparently first class. The biggest reason for this is the fact that Albion, Hillsdale, Olivet and Kalamazoo will be represented by experienced teams.

Lack of reserve material promises to be the biggest handicap to Alma. Coach Campbell apparently will have material enough for a formidable first five, but beyond that the fans have difficulty in seeing where there will be any replacement material or quality sufficient for use.

ATHLETICS

Representative Clancy of Hillsdale is quoted as saying that the legislature at Lansing had many new ideas on the string this session and he expected much would be accomplished but could tell nothing now. One bill in particular which is expected to come up is the capitol punishment law, using lethal gas as the killer. Probably there will as usual be a hot time and nothing passed that way. The sobbers will be on hand to block moves without doubt.

House Keeping at The White House

Mrs. Jaffray, housekeeper at the White House for many years, has this to say of the prominent figures of the mansion during recent years:

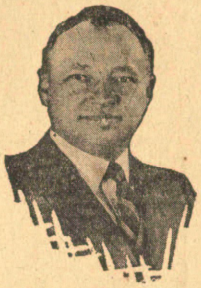
The first Mrs. Wilson, according to Mrs. Jaffray, "lived in a world of her own imagination." "One of her havens of escape from the real world was her painting."

Mrs. Jaffray attributes her death partially to "an unfortunate mental state" which resulted in a loss of all desire to live.

Passing to the engagement and marriage of William G. McAdoo and Eleanor Wilson, Mrs, Jaffray said she first noticed the friendship soon after the marriage of Jessie Wilson and Francis Sayre. It was not long afterward that Mrs. Jaffray wrote in her diary:

"I have an idea that Mr. McAdoo and Miss Eleanor will in the near future join hands for life. All things point that way now."

"At the wedding supper what might have been a scene was averted only by the narrowest margin. Just as the guests were sitting down the second daughter (Miss Mona McAdoo) became hysterical bursting into tears. A scene that might have marred the whole affair was averted only when friends at her table took the young lady out of the room."



Meet Gov. Fred Green

THE ISLE OF PINES

TRANSFORMING a windswept barren island—a stretch of waste land which for centuries had been used as a cattle range where cliffs made by the fire-gods of ages ago towered over the waste—into a veritable garden spot with a model city, surrounded by acres and acres of fertile pineapple fields—this is the story of Lanai, one of the fairy-like islands of the Hawaiian group.

As you drive along over miles of macadamized roads, from the concrete wharf at Kaumalapau harbor through 1200 acres of pineapple plantation, you get your first impression of the Island of Lanai, an impression of orderliness and precision. Not a single plant of the mathematically laid out plots strays an inch from the soldierly ranks. Even the mules that plow the soil seem to hold their ears at a mathematical angle.

Suddenly you round a curve and see in the distance the purple of the Oahu hills.

A few more miles of white road and you are in Lanai City. You are not surprised, after the prelude of perfect order found in the pineapple fields to find the city itself a veritable "spotless town."

Citizens of Lanai who are proud of the civic cleanliness of their town, are just as proud of the orderliness of their pineapple plantations.

You notice the workers look very different from the average farmer who works in the fields. You will be told that this is because the same companies which control the growing of pineapple control the cannery. For this reason there are strict rules about the cleanliness of workers in the fields, just as there are rules for white aprons and rubber gloves in the factories The workers are of many nationalities, Chinese, Japanese, Portuguese, Filipinos, Fiji Islanders Americans and native Hawaiians Some of them wear the round flat straw hats popular with those who work under tropical suns, but all of them wear clean overalls and shirts.

After visiting this "Isle of Pines" where some of the best pineapples in the world are grown, one is anxious to see the inside of the big cannery where these perfect pineapples are canned so successfully. There, too, is the same atmosphere of cleanliness which characterizes the town and plantations. But instead of the quiet of the fields, there is the hum of busy activity. Well-ordered shiny machines are moving with clock-like accuracy, peeling, slicing and syruping the fruit. One is impressed on watching the women workers who pack the slices into cans, endless rows of rubber gloves moving at lightning speed. Besides wearing spotless caps and aprons, rubber gloves are a strict rule of pineapple canneries, for sanitary reasons since no pineapple is ever touched by ungloved hands.

The rows of shiny cans which are packed outside in truck loads ready to take the steamer to other lands, seem to be a symbol of the spotless life of the pineapple from "birth" to its world career in cans. And when these cans come to you from Hawaii you will find in the rich golden goodness of the fruit, and the clear amber juices, perhaps a reflection of the atmosphere of that "spotless town" in that beautiful Isle of Pines, where the pineapple grew to golden maturity.

Athletics

North Adams High School played Allen here last Friday evening The Girls team won 28 to 10, and are still undefeated in this state. The Boys lost 20 to 9.

Wednesday night the North Adams Panthers played their second game here with Vandercook Lake opposing. The visitors were certainly in good form and the game proved to be the most interesting and spectacular so far. Vandercook Lake had some long shot artists, and many local supporters were afraid that these might be enough to beat North Adams.

Our team matched these long Toms with short under the basket shots. Wilcox and Radabaugh each contributed mid-floor shots. The game was tied up three times in the last quarter, although North Adams was leading throughout most of the game.

Don Thornton played a fine game at guard and his work with the able support of Wilcox, kept Vandercook from making any easy shots. Van made 5 field goals and four fouls which helped us to eventually win out, 23 to 21

Friday evening the High school teams play Waldron here. Saturday evening Hanover will be here to oppose the town team. Turn out and see all these games. There is sure to be real excitement.

SLEUTHS DEPEND ON HORSE SENSE

Fiction has placed the detective in a false light. Such characters as Sherlock Holmes, Arsene Lupin, Monsieur Lecoq and the modern Craig Kennedy do not exist in lead life. Crimes are not solved by heroic and exaggerated methods, but by simple horse sense, if you should ask the plainclothesmen of the Detroit police force. Simple horse sense may be called "deductive reasoning" but Detroit's detectives prefer to use the first term, because it is more explanatory.

Several days ago Judge Christopher E. Stein sentenced Anthony Bongartz to a term of from 15 to 30 years in Jackson prison for robbery. The case did not excite even a casual interest in the Recorder's court, for Bongartz was but one of many bandits committed to prison and nothing spectacular in the way of testimony had been brought up at his trial. Little did spectators know that the rather pale and shrinking young man who tried to express indifference when he heard Judge Stein pronounce the sentence was the dominant figure in the mystery that was worthy of the efforts of Holmes or Lupin.

Two detectives, Sergeants Edward Graff and Harry Schouw, had produced Bogartz from nowhere. As if by a conjurer's trick they snatched him from the aid and presented him before the court. They had but one clue to work upon—a fragile clue at best—yet they got their man. It was not by the hocus-pocus work of the book detective, but by the horse sense that tells people they must not tamper with a stick of dynamite or stand in the way of an oncoming train.

It was the old story of a Damon and Pythias friendship between two bandits. One was convicted, but steadily refused to reveal the identity of the other. He tried so hard to shield his companion that he unwittingly betraeyd him, the last thing in the world he intended to do. Bongartz the companion, was the victim of love, not of hate or treachery as is usually the case—love and good police work.

CARGO OF 200 CARS IN TRAPPED SHIP GUARDED

The Eagle Harbor coast guard has been placed in charge of policing the City of Bangor, which is held high and dry on a reef at Keweenaw Point with a cargo of more than 200 automobiles aboard. The heavy sea which rolls around the point at this time of year makes the removal of the cargo and release of the ship unlikely for several months.

A. W. Glaza, captain of the coast guard, who rescued the crews of the Bangor and Maytham recently, has stationed a guard on shore near the ship, which is in shallow water 150 feet from the beach. The public has been warned to stay away from the ship and the guards have been instructed to arrest any person found tampering with the ship or her cargo and a charge of piracy will be lodged against any offender.

POULTRY RAISERS WARNED AGAINST FATAL CHICK-POX

In an effort to protect Michigan poultry producers against the recorrence of chicken-pox, prevalent in many sections of the state last year, the Michigan State college poultry department is issuing a warning to producers and instrucing them in the methods of prevention and cure.

Last winter, particularly in January, February and March, the disease was responsible for the loss of thousands of hens and an untold loss in egg production. It is highly infectious, affecting the head, nasal passages and throat, and usually is first noticed with the appearance of yellow, wart-like nodules on the comb and wattles. These spots change color rapidly and soon become black or dark brown in color. Accompanying the external lesions the bird usually suffers from cankers in the throat and the windpipe. Death is usually the result of a canker in the windpipe which completely shuts of the supply of air and the bird dies from strangulation.

If chicken-pox appears in a flock, potassium permanganate should be kept in the drinking water to prevent spread from bird to bird as the drinking water is usually the source of dissemination of the disease.

FATHER AND SON TO AID MUSEUM WILL EXPLORE THE AMAZON

Edward M. Brigham, Battle Creek scientist, is planning on a new trip of exploration and additions to the Battle Creek museum of natural history in 1927. Though his plans are not yet completed, he expects to make him fifth trip to the Amazon Valley in South America and his third excursion across that continent thru its wildest and widest part.

Edward Brigram, Jr., now an associate of his father, who made a trip to Mexico and Central America with him last summer, will accompany him again.

Brigham and his son left Battle Creek July 5 for the trip which took them through Mexico and Guatemala into Honduras. This expedition was largely photographic and after many exciting experiences, the local explorers reached Battle Creek on October 22.

COPS BAR "BANDIT" AS COMPLIMENT TO THUGS

The term "bandit" is a misnomer Detroit Police Commissioner Rutledge says.

Ordering that in departmental documents holdup men shall appear as "thugs" or "thieves," the commissioner defined a bandit as "rightfully a man of bravery and resolution, who comes down from the mountains to hold up a stage coach or train."

"He is a sturdy, though criminal type," the commissioner said, "whereas the men who commit holdups in Detroit are only yellow cowards. They do not deserve the name 'bandit.'"

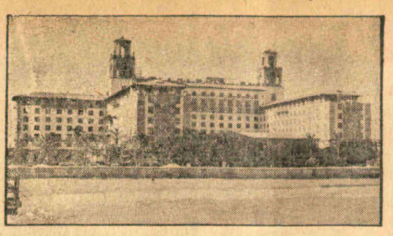
Seven Million Dollar Hotel Opened



Built upon the ruins of the old Breakers Hotel, destroyed by fire in March, 1925, the new $7,000,000 Breakers at Palm Beach, Fla., has been opened. Rates run as high as $55 a day for a double room. Photo taken as finishing touches were being added to the 450-room hostelry.

STYLE HARMONY ESSENTIAL TO CHIC

Match your frock or your blouse to the lining of the coat. This is a rule that is one of the fundamentals of present fashions. And there is much to be said in its favor. In this way the various parts of the costumes are linked together to produce that effect of harmony so essential to true chic. This year it is not necessary to have everything match in color, but there must be correlation between the different elements that go into the smart costume.

Velvet is mostly seen for all types of afternoon gowns, plain velvets predominating. One original design is in small blue and beige checks. Moire is worn by the older women, and made on perfectly plain lines. Heavy georgette, crepe, satin and Marocain are among other materials.

The majestic lames of yesterday are gone forever and the silky lame has taken its place. Dance frocks are made of soft shot or plain lames and evening coats, which are hugged tightly round the figure, are also made of lame.

Some evening frocks are embroidered with rhinestones and paillettes. Others are perfectly plain draped on classic lines. The little dance frock with columilnous skirt lends itself exquisitely to these new soft clinging lames.

Perhaps it is because there are such countless trimmings and novelties that some of the smartest shoes are now made up in tri-tone effects. An attractive combination on a golden brown kid sandal is brown galuchat outlined with narrow bands of gold. Another two-strap street slipper of blond kid has insets of leopard-calf which are outlined in dark brown. A plain pump which combines brown kid and suede has a twisted fringe tongue faced in dull gold. Ebony kid, because of its deep black lustre combines effectively with silver and gray; gold and beige; or two harmonizing shades of dull blue. Frequently, kid oxfords have heels and toe-caps of lizard or snakeskin. Suede combines well with matching patent leather and plain patent leather pumps with smart cut steel buckles are appropriate for almost any occasion.

QUICKSAND LEAK CLOSED— HUGE PLANT AGAIN RUNS

After being shut down since last August because of a leak discovered in the quicksand underneath the powerhouse of the Michigan Northern Power company at Sault Ste. Marie, the big dynamos of the world's longest powerhouse again were set in motion when the canal was filled.

The street car system again has been put into service. A solid steel wall 1,500 feet long was driven around the forebay end of the power canal, 50 feet deep to solid rock, at a cost of more than $100,000.

SEEK SCHOOL BIDS AS INTEREST EATS INTO BOND PRINCIPAL

The difference between $72,000 and $85,000 is causing the school board of Grass Lake more grief than a squad of flappers would experience in the garden of Prosperpine. It has held up the construction of a new high school unit, caused some criticism of the school board, and left a municipal riddle for the community to solve.

The trouble started last spring when the voters authorized a $72,000 bond issue for an addition to the high school. A firm of Detroit architects had estimated that the work could be done for that sum, but when the board advertised for bids the lowest one received was for $85,000.

The bonds had been sold and the board had the money. The momentous question of what to do with it was solved by purchasing liberty bonds. These bring 4 per cent interest, while the school bonds draw 4 1-4 per cent.

The board plans to re-advertise for bids again soon, hoping to find a contractor who will undertake the job for the money now available, slightly less than $72,000.

ROCKIES IN MINIATURE USED AT COLLEGE IN PLANT EXPERIMENTS

In imitation of western mountain conditions, a miniature "rockery" is being constructed in the botanical gardens at Michigan State college, under the direction of Dr. H. T. Darlington of the college botany department, for the purpose of experimenting with the adaptation of plants to climatic conditions.

Large boulders are set in the surface of the ground in an irregular bed with sunny slope and exposure. The construction is under way in the northern section of the botanical gardens, beyond the old log cabin and lily pond, beauty spot of the campus.

Plants native to western states are sent to Dr. Darlington for planting in this "rockery." They are carefully tended and their growth is watched and recorded.

PORTLAND TO BE PORT ON DETROIT AIRPLANS ROUTE

Portland will have an airport in the near future, according to an announcement by city officials following a conference with George Carter Miller, representing the areonautics branch of the national department of commerce. When completed, the flying field will have a 50-foot tower carrying a searchlight powerful enough to be seen 25 miles, it is said. The port will be the only field between Grand Rapids and Detroit.

WOMAN CIRCLES EARTH TWICE IN TEST FOR TIRES

Fifty thousand miles of travel over all sorts of road and in all weathers, without the slightest mechanical trouble of any sort, is the record achieved since May by Mrs. Gertrude Noble of Royal Oak, tire tester for a rubber company.

Mrs. Noble's work demands that she average 250 miles of travel every day, and this she has done, her daily record reveals. She has traveled 50,234 miles, the equivalent of 16 coast to coast trips, or twice around the globe.

PLAN FOR FLINT RIVER CUTOFF IS ABANDONED

Nearly three years of discussion ended abruptly when the special drainage board meeting in Saginaw and composed of drain commissioners from 11 counties voted 9 to 2 to abandon the proposed Flint River cutoff. The plan was designed as the first step of a major drainage operation designed to relieve high water conditions in the lowlands of the Saginaw Valley watershed and other sections of the state and to provide a greater outlet for the Flint River.

QUAIL DECREASE CAUSE IS SOUGHT

Prof. A. A. Allen of Cornell university, who has been investigating grouse disease through America, reports that there is a decided difference in the size of Michigan ruffed grouse and those from New York and the New England states. Michigan birds are considerably smaller and Prof. Allen has asked the conservation department to list the weights of any birds that conservation officers may collect for scientific purposes. He also reports that 43 carcasses of the Michigan grouse examined showed no signs of the "grouse disease" but were parasited with gizzard worms.

A sportsman of the Upper Peninsula expresses his views upon the ruffed grouse situation above the Straits.

His opinion in the director's mind, is sensible. He states that it is not the lack of food or feeding grounds that is depleting this stock. It is a combination of circumstances.

"Less than one-tenth of one per cent of our birds die from disease," he states. "The greatest contributing cause is the spring shooter who goes out into the cutings in April and May, follows the edge of the swamp looking for drumming birds, finds them by ear, kills just for the breast and throws away the back, legs and wings.

"Next comes the red squirrel, which eats the eggs of the nesting grouse.

"Then follows the ticks in June. The young birds get them in their throats and die.

After this comes the little screech owl, the most direct killer of the entire owl family. He will get down under a windfall, walk like any other ground bird, killing partridge where the horned owl cannot go.

"Then we have the stray housecat, the forgotten tabby which when deserted reverts to the wild and breeds, living in a great measure upon our game birds.

"The weasel is the last of all, in the same class as the mink as a killer. A mink will kill solely for the pleasure of seeing the bird flop."

MICHIGAN FUTURE HINGES ON EXAMS

Whether the University of Michigan will repeat its success of last year on the basketball court depends largely on what the mails bring forth in the way of grades when the candidates tear open the envelopes at the end of the first semester.

Last year the ineligibility jinx struck swiftly and brutally at Michigan's hopes, and for a while disaster stared the disorganized Wolverines in the face. Petrie, a class guard prospect; Cherry, Michigan's mainstay for two seasons previous; Molenda, who was then beginning to acquire fame for his open shots under the basket, and Martin, promising forward, were lost, as it were, at one fell swoop.

Faced by a tough schedule, Michigan started reorganizing, and after dropping a few games here and there, the revamped squad started after the leaders. Reese, Ginn and Oosterban were worked in with Harrigan, Chambers and Doyle, and Illinois, Wisconsin and Ohio State fell before the attack of the underboys.

At the end of last season, Michigan was going at a terrific clip, and there is no doubt that had the season been a trifle longer, the Wolverines would have made up the lost ground and topped the Big Ten, instead of being forced to share honors with three other teams.

What will happen this year, no one can fortell.

Some neighbors, if they acted true to their feelings, would swap shots.

ELECTRICIAN GOES IN ON BIG SCALE FOR RAISING MUSKRATS

Edward F. Plunkett, Muskegon electrical inspector, is the owner of an acre of muskrats.

How many muskrats are there in an acre? Mr. Plunkett is unable to say definitely, but he estimates he owns 150 rats. He believes that by next summer he will have 1500 on his acre farm, which soon is to be enlarged to ten acres.

Only two years ago Mr. Plunkett, who owns 40 acres of marsh land in the center of the Muskegon river delta fenced off one acre and placed four muskrate inside the fence. The entire acre has been undermined by runways and nests since that time.

During the last three months the rats have consumed more than 40 bushels of carrots in addition to the natural feed of the land. A large hole has been dug near one of the ponds and there bushels of carrots are dumped frequently. The carrots are carried away during the night by the industrious muskrats and stored for the winter in nests beneath the ground

FORD SEES DEBT AS ONLY MENACE

Any attempt to forecast business prospects for 1927 must be tempered with the fact that the year opens with a great surplus of everything on hand, says Henry Ford.

Mr. Ford took occasion to spike a few rumors, among them that he plans production of a low-priced, six-cylinder car, discussed the difference between credit and debt, and reiterated his belief in the economic value of the five-day week.

"Not only is there a large surplus of grown and fabricated material now on hand," Mr. Ford said, "but there is also a large surplus of debt. Undoubtedly the material surplus will be absorbed in the natural course of events, and the year 1927 should be one of normalcy."

"What is prosperity, anyway?" Mr. Ford asked. "A real prosperity is that in which all participate and in which all are consumers. When man consumes he must produce, and when there is the proper balance between production and consumption prosperity is bound to follow."

"You know," Mr. Ford went on, "we did build a six twenty years ago. We made a thousand of them. Two of them now are in our museum."

Mr. Ford also denied that he was at present financially interested in rubber growing. He added, however, that some developments in the future might attract him to that field.

Concerning automobile production in 1927, Mr. Ford expressed the opinion that the year would be about normal. He was careful to point out again, however, that 1926 was abnormal. "Of the total 1926 production of cars of all makes, ten per cent or more were repossessed by the sales agencies for non-payment. The trade anticipates a repossession ratio of one per cent of all the machines sold on the deferred payment plan. This condition shows that a portion of the people are buying things they cannot pay for."

Concerning credit and debt, the motor manufacturer said;

"There is a point up to which credit is constructive, but beyond that point it becomes destructive.

"The habit of never wholly owning anything we use, never having that personal attitude toward quality which use and ownership give, is simply to cease working for oneself and become something like a mortgaged servant. This is a situation for which no good word can be spoken."

The strength of both men and tea is not fully drawn out until they have been in hot water.

Fire Trucks Meet in Fatal Crash

With a crash heard for blocks, a fire engine and a hook and ladder rig come together in San Francisco killing two and injuring ten. On the sounding of the alarm, Andrew Heuft, a retired captain of the Detroit fire department was in the fire house telling yarns of his experiences. He was invited to hop aboard one of the outgoing trucks. His name is among the dead.

BEGGARS CLEARED OFF CITY STREETS

"Say, pal," a young six-footer stopped a passerby on a downtown Detroit street, "I gotta get back to Redford and I wunner if you could stake me for the fare. How about it?"

"Are you broke?" asked the man.

"Haven't even had breakfast," was the answer.

"All right; if you're broke, I'll stake you. Come along with me and I'll find out."

And that's where the husky pleader realized he had made a mistake. Of all the people in Detroit he had stopped Fletcher Phillips and Phillips is not only a detective, but the detective assigned to rid the downtown section of professional beggars.

This particular beggar was taken to police headquarters and searched. His pockets yielded $37.87, or, as Phillips pointed out, enough for carfare to New York, including Pullman accommodations.

"That's nothing," declared Officer Clare Race, who registers vagrants, "I have yet to see the professional beggar who didn't have from $20 to $50 in his pockets."

Warring on professional beggars netted 160 fakers in six weeks just before Christmas and revealed many of the tricks by which they work on the sympathies of thousands who are much less able to dispense charity than the beggars themselves.

"Why, they even had a school," declared Detective Phillips. "I have watched them from hiding—old-timers teaching their pupils how to throw bones out to joint and had to fold their arms and legs in such a manner as to draw the sympathy and small coins from kind-hearted people."

COVERT ACT IS UNDER FIRE IN FEDERAL COURT

The Covert Act, under which thousands of miles of highways have been built in Michigan, is being attacked in the Federal courts for the first time in a suit brought by Francis Lewis, of Chicago, against the Muskegon County Highway Commission. In view of the question raised, the Attorney-General has entered the suit along with Muskegon County.

The suit was brought in connection with the construction of a $500,000 scenic highway along Lake Michigan between Muskegon and White Lake. The contract has been awarded and much of the grading has been done. In addition, the bonds have been sold to a Detroit firm.

BUCK STUNNED BY HUNTER FLEES WITH LICENSE ON HORN

Oscar Lebouf, of Menominee, Michigan, shot a fine big buck. Congratulating himself he tied his license to the buck's horn securing it well, for he expected to drag the deer out and it might catch in a brush and tear out. After fastening the license tag to the animal he examined the "carcass" to see where the fatal bullet had struck. At this juncture Lebouf was astonished to see the deer start to its feet with a snort of fear and jump three or four times its own length toward the woods. He was so startled he did not raise his gun. A little later he spied it was the same deer he had hit and he was fearful to shoot because he had no license to attach as the runaway deer had that. He thinks he merely creased the first buck, stunning it.

EQUIPMENT AS GUIDE TO FLYERS BEING INSTALLED

Installation of equipment to guide aviators while flying at night has been started at Selfridge Field. The improvements will cost $100,000, according to Maj. Thomas G. Lanphier, commandant. The field will be marked with boundary lights and a huge flood light will be installed.

GIRL RETURNS TO COLLEGE ON FEB. 1 AS EDUCATOR

Miss Clarissa Anderson, East Lansing, graduate of the class of 1924 at Michigan State college, will return to the college February 1 to take up her duties as instructor in co-ed physical education. Her appointment was announced by Miss Helen Grimes, the head of the department.

BATTLE CREEK FREIGHT MOVEMENT SHOWS GAIN

Business in Battle Creek during 1926 has been in a healthy condition as compared with 1925, according to figures given out by transportation agencies regarding freight movements for the year. Gains are said to exceed other cities of the state.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

Saturday morning he and Roberta, somewhat depressed in spirit, watching from their hilltop for signs of Scott's departure, saw the station cab drive up to the door. A man sprang from it and ran up the steps.

"That's Clif!" Roberta gasped. "Peter, he must be hunting for me!"

"Ow," said Piggy with deep feeling.

Warned by the tumult of the chained dogs, Scott, also, had seen Nixon's approach, and had sent his wife and daughter upstairs on the pretex that Clif was coming to discuss important business with him. Suspecting all walls, however, even his own, of auricular properties, he had no fancy for conducting within them what might well prove a stormy interview with this young man. Therefore he intercepted the maid who came to answer the bell, sent her back to the kitchen and opened the door himself, grimly confronting the haggard man without.

"Well, Clif?"

"Is Roberta here?" Nixon moved as if to enter, but the other's huge bulk filled the doorway.

"That name is never mentioned in my house," Scott said, scowling.

"If you've got to use it, we'll step out on the terrace. And keep your voice down. Celia's not well and I don't want her excited—nor my wife, either. But if you've come up here," he added, closing the door and leading the way to the outer edge of the terrace, "with any idea of interfering in a family matter—well, you'd better not, that's all."

"I haven't. Your affairs are none of my business. I've come to find Roberta. Where is she?"

Scott studied him keenly. "Don't you know?"

"I do not. But I'm going to." Nixon made no attempt to conceal his anger. "What have you done with her?"

"Not a thing, Clif. I haven't seen her. Have you?"

"No. She's disappeared."

Her father chuckled. "Called your bluff, did she? Thought you said you were going to marry her?"

"I was—and am, when I find her. That's what she came over for—to marry me."

"H'mph! That isn't the story she told when she got here. She said she'd come to meet some client named Mrs. Miles, and was going to sail again with this woman today."

"What? Then you have seen her?"

"Not I!" Scott repeated the detective's report, ending with Roberta's disappearance at the Pennsylvania station and the failure of Washington detectives to identify her there. "So, if you do find her, let me know, will you?" he continued. "If she hasn't sailed today, I want to know where she is and what she's up to. Have you any idea who the man was who met her at the Grand Central and took her to lunch?"

"Yes." Nixon was frowning perplexedly. "At least— No, I don't know who he is, but I sent him with a message for her. I was to meet her myself and we were to be married at once—"

"Had she agreed to that?" her father interrupted.

"Certainly. It was all arranged by letter and cable. At the last moment my secretary called me on long distance and told me a directors' meeting had been called—but I needn't explain that to you." He shot an irate glance at Scott, who smiled, still not perceiving that one of his chickens had returned to its roost in the proverbial manner. "I had to hustle like the deuce to catch a train that would get me home in time for the meeting, and I also had to get word to Roberta, because she was to wait for me at the station in case I was delayed. I hadn't expected to get here until that morning. I was afraid a messenger boy wouldn't find her, but at the ferry I saw a good-looking young chap—tall, brown hair, gray eyes, well dressed—gentleman—"

Scott nodded. "That's the man. Ever seen him before?"

"Never. But I explained enough of the situation and described Roberta, without using any names, not even my own. He promised to find her, and to tell her to let me know where she was and that I'd be back in two or three days. This is the first assurance I've had that anybody met her. Of course, it's possible that when he got there he found he knew her. I can't see any other explanation of their going to lunch together." Neither man suspected that the usually canny Roberta had arrived penniless. "I got back Wednesday, expecting to find a note from her at the club, telling me where she was, but there wasn't any word. I've been to every hotel in New York, and she isn't there. None of her friends knew that she was in town. I've telephoned to a dozen or more of them. Now, where is she?"

"Give it up," said Scott.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX

Scott and Nixon recognized that each seemed to be telling the truth, yet both were suspicious. Nixon, aware that Roberta's father had deliberately arranged the director's meeting to prevent his meeting her on her arrival believed not only that Scott would feign ignorance of her whereabouts even if he knew it, but also that he was capable of locking up the elder daughter as he had the younger.

Moreover, guiltily conscious that he had permitted business to supersede love at a critical moment, he suspected that Roberta had revenged herself for his neglect by setting out upon the expedition of succor against which he had warned her. In this case, Scott would inevitably connect him with the attempt, which brought him back to business considerations again, and to consequences not to be contemplated. Giddy from trying to maintain his equilibrium amid these complicated, interlacing circles of thought, he realized that he must guard his tongue.

Scott, equally in the dark as to what had become of Roberta, doubted that a person capable of such filial apostasy as hers would keep faith with anyone. But he was fully cognizant of her powers of attraction and cajolery, as well as of Nixon's long courtship, and he was by no means certain that this move was not part of a shrewd plan to get into communication with Celia.

Therefore they eyed each other warily, and five hundred yards away in an air line, the object of their discussion, watching through the glass, whispered to Piggy, "Oh, I wish we had something to help us hear them, too!"

"If she was going to marry you," Scott went on after a pause, "why did she land at Quebec? Why didn't she come straight in at the front door?"

Naturally, considering the terms upon which Roberta had agreed to this marriage, Nixon knew quite well why she had chosen to arrive at the back door; but his promised participation in her project was the last thing he wished Scott to suspect, so he temporized.

"Perhaps she wanted to see Quebec. I believe she'd never been there. Or possibly some one she knew was coming that way. Anyhow, she cabled me to meet that train—and I didn't." The other's eyes gleamed at the evasion, but he made no comment and Nixon went on, frowning. "What I don't understand is this talk about a client in Washington and sailing today. Why, she couldn't have had any such plan! She was to marry me Monday!"

"Well, that just shows you," Scott shrugged. "Probably she had more than one string to her bow. It's like her. You'd better be thankful that she threw you down before you married her, instead of afterward."

"I dare say she thinks I threw her down," Nixon mentioned morosely.

"Maybe she does. But I'd say, knowing her, that it's more likely she never intended to marry you at all."

"I swear she did! She promised ——and she's no liar! I thought something might have happened to her—some accident—but none of the hospitals know anything about her."

"Good Lord. Have you been hunting through them, too?"

"I've done everything I could think of—except advertise."

"Well, for God's sake don't do that!"

"I'm going to find her." The young man's tone was dogged.

"All right, find her. Marry her, if you want to, and more fool to you! But you see to it that my name—and she still bears my name—doesn't get into print in this business. Understand?" Nixon nodded, flushing as he recognized his master's voice, and Scott turned suddenly suave. "Sorry I can't invite you in, Clif, but Celia's in pretty bad shape. She's gone to pieces nervously and we're keeping her quiet. She isn't allowed to see anyone. Let me know if you find Roberta, will you? I'll do the same by you."

"Will you?" Nixon regarded him searchingly and Scott laughed.

"Sure I will! You'll wish I hadn't, if you marry her, but that's your funeral. If you're hunting for trouble, that's the way to find it. All I want is to make sure that she lets me and mine alone."

Nixon immediately departed, and Scott stood for a long time on the terrace, deep in thought. The affair was baffling, like Roberta herself; therefore irritating. On the one hand not knowing—unless the detective had lied—that she was followed, she had fully outlined her plans to the unidentified man at the Waldorf and had carried themout to the extent of ordering her luggage sent to the Pennsylvania and buying a ticket for Washington. Perhaps she really had taken that train, her small figure hidden by the crowd at either end from the eyes of the watchers. This solution seemed to stretch the arm of coincidence abnormally, though not beyond the limit of possibility.

On the other hand, she had landed at Quebec, arrived in New York heavily veiled, disappeared under the very nose of the detective, and might be now, as Clif evidently suspected—or perhaps knew?—somewheres in the vicinity of Birchwood, awaiting an opportunity to strike at what should have been her altars and her fires. And various imperative business appointments, notably a conference with Brazenose, demanded his presence in New York early Monday morning.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SEVEN

Frowning heavily, Scott went in to resume his attack upon Celia, whose forces had been visibly diminished by his repeated assurance that Roberta had come to and gone, making no attempt either to see or to communicate with her. He had given his word that no letter had been confiscated.

Consequently, convinced with the emotional certainty of seventeen that nobody loved her, harangued by her father, wept at and exhorted by her mother, Celia was sustained now only by a sullen unwillingness to confess herself defeated, and even that was wearing thin. A considerable amount of water had gone under the bridges during the months of what she called her persecution, and despite the sensitiveness that Roberta knew and feared—partly, in fact, because of it—Scott's tactics had evoked an underlying obstinacy akin to his own. Dreading his hectoring mastery even more than his wrath, she had developed in self protection a moody, if somewhat colorless, perversity. At this moment, however, sympathy and an appeal to her more tender emotions would have broken down her last defense and reduce her to permanent submission. But that was not the way of either parent.

Therefore, doubly nettled by his interview with Nixon and the emphasized uncertainties of the situation, Scott summoned the rebel to the living room and demanded:

"Are you going to come to your senses before I go?"

Celia was silent.

"Answer when I speak to you! Will you apologize and promise to do as you're told?"

"I don't—I—no, I won't," She clung to her ebbing determination, but he saw that she wavered and characteristically offered her a bribe.

"Do it before I go and you can come home next week. Theaters, dances, plenty of friends—as long as you behave yourself."

"Will—will you let me go to college?" she faltered, reviving an old and forbidden ambition. Scott disapproved of advanced education for females, as Roberta could testify. This had been a part of her quarrel, too.

"I will not. I can't trust you out of my sight. But you can do some studying at home and have all the amusement that's good for you. Well?"

"No!" She achieved a pale defiance, though under his glare it speedily degenerated into sulkiness. "You're trying to buy me. You have no right to treat me this way."

"Haven't I. What I ought to do is to take you over my knee and spank you, instead of offering you everything a normal girl could want. But you're not normal, and I'll keep you right here until you are—or somewhere else, if necessary, as I told you the other day."

She shrank at that and he pursued his advantage. "You can end it any time you like. The sooner the better for all of us. It's up to you. Say the word now and I'll arrange to have this house closed next week. Think it over."

Drooping and disheartened, Celia stood beside the big library table, fingering a parcel of technical books that Scott had left at Birchwood during the summer and now needed in New York. One of the servants had wrapped them for him.

She might as well give up. Until that morning she had hoped for some word or sign from her sister, but evidently her father was right. Roberta had sailed without seeing her; Pierre had forgotten her. Deserted, helpless in the hands of a ruthless dictator, what was the use? In the total devastation of hope and faith and ideals, what could the minor humiliation of apology and surrender matter? Never, never could she be happy again, but at least she need not be a prisoner. She was beaten.

Preoccupied with her attempt to find suitable phrases of submission, she pulled the parcel of books nearer and her attention was caught by a penciled line of hieroglyphics. Celia's teacher said that had she been a man, she would have been a mathematical genius, and she puzzled over this problem for a moment. "The unknown quantity, plus is greater than, plus, equals is greater than." It looked mathematical—but wasn't. The unknown quantity, plus is greater than, plus, equal—sheer nonsense. Wearily she pushed the books away and looked up, prepared to humble herself and give her parole. But after all she was Scott's own daughter, and his first rasping words called forth every impulse of antagonism and obstinacy with which his blood had endued her.

"Well? Ready to apologize?"

She gave him a glance from the corner of her eye, saw his bristling, overbearing attitude, and quite unexpectedly to herself replied: "No!"

"You're not?" He came close, flushed, lowering, and she cringed a little, thinking for a moment that he was going to strike her. "What do you expect to gain by this?"

"Nothing. I won't apologize, that's all."

Perceiving that no physical violence threatened, she faced him with a dogged defiance very different from Roberta's fire in a similar situation. But he recognized for the second time that in his offspring he met flesh of his flesh, bone of his bone, and something of his own stubborn spirit.

"Go to your room," he snapped. "Stay there until I've gone. I don't want to see you again."

Celia went.

Shortly thereafter, the couple on the hillside saw Cody carry out Scott's bag and his own, and stow them, with the parcel of books, in the waiting car. A few minutes later G. A. was driven away, only his wife appearing to wave adieux from the terrace, from which they inferred that Celia was still holding her own and rejoiced greatly.

"Now we can get down to business. This leaves the gardener the only man on the place, and the coast's as clear as it ever will be," Piggy announced blithely, never dreaming that Mr. Clifford Nixon, convinced that Roberta must be somewhere in the neighborhood, had taken up his temporary abode at the Jaffrey Inn and was already making carefully veiled inquiries in the pursuance of his quest.

CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHT

Again that night Piggy whistled his merry roundelay from Lookout Hill, and again Roberta was waiting for him when he burst into the house, breathless from the pace he had taken in his desire to reach her quickly.

"She's got it!" he shouted jubilantly. "She's answered!"

"Oh, Peter!" Roberta thrust both her hands into his and he held them a moment, looking down into her eager face, while hot shivers surged over him and his heart raced faster than ever. "Tell me! How?"

"Wai—wait 'til I get a drink," he stammered, turning toward the kitchen. "Im all—out o' breath."

But Roberta could not wait. She followed him, begging: "Tell me, quick! Are you sure? What happened?"

"I whistled—same old tune," he replied, between gulps of cold water, which somehow relieved him less than he had anticipated. "And I saw a flash in the corner window."

"Which corner?"

"The one nearest our hill."

"That's mother's room."

"Well, maybe Celia has it now. Anyway, I flashed twice and she flashed twice, so I knew. She found the note."

In which he was mistaken.

Celia had not found the note. Mrs. Scott had opened the parcel containing it, and discovering the scrap of paper on the floor later had dropped it into a waste-basket without looking at it. The next morning the contents of the basket had been burned by a maid, and Celia's subsequent response to Piggy's signal had been the result of pure logic.

She had spent the first hour or two after her father's departure sitting beside a window in her mother's bedroom, an apartment she had been compelled to share since her incarceration. Tears trickled unheeded down her cheeks as she reflected upon the vanity of all created things and the insensate folly that had prompted her to refuse such liberty as had been offered her.

As her father had pointed out, she had nothing to gain by persistence, and now that her eyes had been opened at last to the hollowness of human relationships and the futility of faith, equally little to lose by yielding. Why should she alone, of the whole wide world, be constant? Who cared? Staring resentfully at the timbered slope opposite—unbroken contemplation of the eternal hills had not impressed her with their majesty—she reasoned again that even if life could not be happy, it might under different conditions be less monotonous. If only her father had not made it so difficult to surrender. . . . Still, she would have to do it sooner or later; it might as well be now. Perhaps a letter. . . .

But when, having found her drawer the stub of a pencil and some paper, she sat down to draft her apoligy, the words would not come. For a long time she traced meaningless arabesques, and at length her mind drifted to that curious, quasi-mathematical penciling on the wrapping paper. Idly reproducing it, she wondered what it could mean. "The unknown quantity, plus is greater than, plus, equals is greater than." It reminded her of something . . . the notes she and Roberta . . . Could it be? Trembling, she stared at all the characters, trying to recall the all but forgotten cipher code. Plus stood for e. x . . . x was h. Equals—that was the sign separating the words. Then came "is greater than" trice the devastated universe was miraculously restored. God was still in his heaven and all right with the world. Thus do extremes, colliding, blend and merge into one glory—at seventeen.

She sat bemused, smiling out at the friendly hill. Roberta had not deserted her; she was near. How could they meet? How had she contrived to write that message on the wrapping paper? From what shop had it come? How long had it been in the house? Had she made other attempts?

Then came a click in her brain. The whistle! The whistle from the hill, that for four nights had vexed her with its diabolic reiteration and suggestion.

"You'll be sorry by and by
You ever had a daughter."

Celia laughed aloud and then looked hurriedly around to assure herself that she had not been overheard. How stupid she had been! Now she must let Roberta know that she understood—but how? Her first thought was to steal out of the house when she heard the signal and run for the hill—but there were the dogs. If she whistled or called out in reply, it would awaken her mother and arouse suspicion. A light? She dared not scratch a match, nor switch on the electricity in the room, and her mother, who was timid, always locked her bedroom door at night. Besides, the hinge squeaked. But somewhere in the house . . . While Mrs. Scott took an afternoon nap, Celia rummaged until she found an electric torch, which she smuggled upstairs and hid under the mattress on her side of the wide bed.

CHAPTER TWENTY-NINE

That night Celia lay awake, tense and quivering, through what seemed interminable hours, but at last it came. "Poco, Poco, keep thine eye . . . ." Slowly, stealthily, she crept out of bed and across to the window facing the hill, unfortunately not the one left open at night. Once a board creaked under her foot and her mother's regular snore stopped. Celia crouched, holding her breath until it began again. Afraid to risk rolling up the shade, she pushed aside the net curtains and slipped between shade and window, unable with the utmost care to avoid making some noise. The torch clicked slightly as she showed her light, and four times again when she answered the flashes from the hill.

"Celia?" said a fretful voice. "What are you doing?"

"I—looking out. I couldn't sleep." Celia ducked under the window shade and stood dimly silhuetted against it.

"I thought I saw a queer light."

"It—it's moonlight. I moved the shade. I think I'll put on a bathrobe and go downstairs for a while, mother." She wanted the comfort of that answering flash again.

"You'll do nothing of the kind. Get straight into bed." Celia got into bed, tucking the torch under the mattress again.

"It's hard enough for me to have to stay up here all this time because of your outrageous behavior, without being kept awake all night. I don't see why you can't be like other girls. You have a good father and a good home, and you ought to appreciate them. You ought to be thankful for all he does for you. If you'd just promise, he'd give you everything you wanted—"

"Everything he wanted you mean," Celia interjected, but her mother went on without pause:

"—and the least you can do is show some regard for his wishes, and some gratitude. You're too young now to do everything you'd like. Your good times are coming. Your father knows what is best for you, and it's your duty—and ought to be your pleasure—to obey him. If I'd had your opportunities when I was a girl, I'd have thought I was in heaven. Nobody could be more generous than your father is when you please him, and anybody would think . . ."

On it went and on, until Celia, out of long experience, feigned a gentle snore, whereupon the monologue abruptly ceased to flow and a real snore soon attested that Mrs. Scott slumbered again, leaving the girl free to indulge in a few ecstatic wriggles and to hug herself because at last Roberta had come. Now something would happen. She wondered what it would be—and when.

So, incidently, did Roberta and Piggy. When he had imbibed something over a pint of cold water and the tumult in his veins had abated a little, they repaired again to the living room, built up the dying fire with logs, and sat down in its light to talk.

"Here's your chance, Bob," he remarked slyly. "Ever since we started this thing you've been insisting on a plan of campaign. The time's come when we've got to have one, so get busy."

"I thought you put your faith in direct inspiration and didn't believe in plans," she countered, dimpling.

"They're no good until you get the lay o' the land, and some idea of how the cat's likely to jump when she's turned loose. All you can do at first is to prepare for everything you can think of that could happen, and then watch your chance to start something."

"And you, have,' she said softly. "Peter, what an idiot I was to imagine I could get Celia away alone!"

Piggy flushed to the roots of his dyed hair, but replied in the gruff tone tributes always drew from him:

"Oh well, you'd have done it somehow, if I hadn't butted in. Anyway, we haven't got her yet. It's a darn shame that Cody had to leave with G. A. Otherwise we might have established a sort of underground postal system, and maybe she could have given us some tips. But we may not be able to get any more notes to her, and unless we can, we'll just have to go it blind and take a chance on her playing up."

"Haven't you any plan yourself?"

"Nary a plan. I did have a notion of holding up the car in the woods somewhere, when they had her out driving, and kidnapping her. Highwayman stuff. But that just shows you how senseless it is to waste gray matter on definite schemes, before you know what you're up against. I'll bet that poor kid hasn't been off the place since they brought her up here. So that bubble's busted. I don't see anything for it now but to apply a little moth and corruption to those dogs and break in and steal ourselves. I don't like to poison good pups, though. Gee! I wonder whether powdered ipecac in balls of chopped meat would put 'em out of business for a while, without really hurting 'em?"

2 VILLAGES USED IN POWER CENSUS

Two entire Michigan villages are all farmers living in the intervening territory are participating, as "human laboratory material," in a new and significent experiment, said to be one of the most extensive ever tried in this state, which just has been started by Michigan State college extension officials in an effort to determine to what extent the farmer may use electricity on the farm, and the adaptability of electrical equipment now on the market, to agricultural conditions.

The "100 per cent" co-operation of all farmers in the proposed community has been obtained. The Consumers' Power company has agreed to provide service at special rates, wiring has been completed and current is flowing over the lines between Mason and Danville, the villages chosen.

An analysis of the survey made during the last year and a half by H. J. Gallagher of the college agricultural engineering department reveals the fact that there is neither widespread use of central station current on Michigan farms, nor any general idea among farmers that electricity can be used, economically, for any other purpose than lighting.

INDOOR TRACK DATES ARE CHANGED TO FEB. 19

Michigan A. A. U. indoor track and field championship meet, scheduled at East Lansing January 29, has been changed to February 19. The meet has been postponed, according to Chas. D. Lynch, president of the state amateur athletic body, to bring the meet closer to the national championships which will be held at the Olympia arena in March.

ISLE VIRGIN SOIL SOUGHT BY STATE

Designated by those who have been fortunate enough to have set foot on Grand Island, lying a few miles out into Munising Bay of Lake Superior, as a virgin bit of Old Michigan, unspoiled or undefiled by the hand or works of man, this 13,600 acres of forest and rocks, of inland lakes and tumbling streams is now being sought by the state as a permanent forest and wild life reserve.

This island, twice as large as Macinac Island, guards the entrance to Munising Bay, one of the finest harborns of refuge on the Great Lakes. It has been the property of the Cleveland Cliffs Iron company for years, having been purchased because of its timber and mineral possibilities. Shortly after its acquisition it was decided that it should be set aside as a private forest and game reserve.

The history of Grand Island is associated closely with the history of the Chippewa Indians of Michigan. Little is known of its early days so far as the white man is concerned, although records shows that prior to 1832 the American Fur Trading company was granted a license to locate and transact a fur trade upon the island. Shortly after that Abraham Williams, a native of Vermont, moved his family from Illinois district to Northern Michigan and finally located upon Grand Island. He was directed to this location by Chippewa Chief Omonomonee, whose trime occupied the island. The American Fur Trading company had given up its post upon Grand Island prior to this and Mr. Williams took possession of their buildings establishing a rather profitable fur trade with the Indians throughout the Lake Superior district.

These old log cabins may still be seen upon the south shore and it is believed that they mark the site of the oldest fur trading post in Michigan. The old wooden swing arm which was used to hoist the bundles of fur from the canoes of the Indians to the natural stone landing dock has been preserved in its original state as well as Mr. Williams' headquarters building.

RABBITS DEARTH LAID TO DISEASE

Gradual disappearance of the snowshoe rabbits, within the past few years, is caused by disease.

This information is given the director of conservation in a letter from an up-state sportsman who has devoted the major part of his lifetime to studying wild life in Michigan.

Depletion of the rabbit supply has caused much speculation among hunters and conservationists—speculation on the cause. Disease has been considered as one reason, predatory animals are credited as another.

"In the spring of 1922, the rabbits began to develop a disease in this district known as 'carci diasis'," the letter says. "They were lying on the roads, in footpaths and all over."

"It is a disease that is spread by eating where others have passed the germs and by inoculation from one to another by the great swarm of ticks that stack them in the nose and ears every May and June."

If the rabbit lives through the sickness, it becomes seriously infected with internal water blisters, the pioneer woodsman declares. "I have killed a rabbit of full growth, in the fall or later, that had 100 blisters ranging from the size of bird shot to the size of turkey egg," he says.

NEW STRETCHES OF ROAD OPEM

A continuous stretch of concrete highway is now open from Monroe, Mich., to M-23, the new Detroit-Chicago highway. This stretch was completed when the last few miles of new concrete were opened between Tipton and Cambridge on M-50.

Another welcome anouncement to Michigan motorists was made possible by the opening of M-14 from Jackson to Lansing, which has been one of the most undesirable detours in the southern part of the state.

M-14 has been opened south of Jackson to Somerset, the intersection of M-23, the new Chicago highway. This is a continuous stretch of pavement from Monroe to Lansing, crossing the new M-23.

The four-mile detour north of Pontiac on M-10 has been discontinued for the winter, although the new pavement for this stretch has not been finally completed.

First Veneering

Veneering is the process of coating common wood with slices of rare and costly woods fastened down with glue by screw presses made to fit the surface to be covered. It was first used in the reign of William and Mary, in the last decade of the Seventeenth century. Until that time furniture had been made of solid wood.

Radio's "Friendly Neighbor"

"FRIENDLY NEIGHBOR" to all the farm wives and to the city wives as well is Mrs. Ellen Rose Dickey, conductor of the "Homemakers' Hour" from the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation radio station WLS each Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday at 3:30 p. m.

Lunch time dishes out of the way and preliminary preparations for the dinner taken care of, hundreds of wives may be found before the loud speaker each afternoon. listening to the helpful information purveyed by the "national neighbor."

Mrs. Dickey tells how to make a dress, what to do when the baby swallows a button, how to prepare the most appetizing of dishes, or anything else she is asked by her neighbors of the ether wave.

"Between Ourselves" is the title of one of her regular features. It is a chatty, cheerful session in which she deals with all the wide variety of problems that might confront the housewife.

In addition to her radio work Mrs. Dickey is in charge of the Home Division of the Agricultural Foundation. In this capacity she answers hundreds of letters each week from farm wives in all sections of the United States.

Mrs. Dickey receives a wide variety of neighborly gifts in every mail. Farm wives send her samples of freshly made jams, preserves, pickles, fancy bread, cake, and anything else that can be concocted in or on the kitchen range.

WLS for Better Radio Music

WITH the inauguration of the winter programs, Edgar L. Bill, Director of W L S, the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation station, Chicago, plans to give to its vast audience better radio music. For the first time in history complete operas are being broadcast by a special radio company of all-star singers. Operatic selections, symphonies and other types of the better music are scheduled.

"We are giving our listeners a well-balanced musical diet," said Director Bill, "not too much classical, not too much jazz. We just completed the presentation of a series of four operas by a special radio company. The Little Symphony orchestra is one of our features. 'Painting Pictures With Music,' by Don Malin; a 'Musical Style Show,' by D. A. Clippinger, one of the most noted musicians and musical authorities in America; Ralph Emerson's organ recitals; the interpretative music of the WLS Trio; three of the best jazz orchestras in the country; special dance programs and the harmony singing and playing of May and June and Ford and Glenn give what we consider a well balanced program. But a station's only barometer is the response of its listeners and their criticism is welcomed to guide us."

The Wet States Not Wholly Wet

BY ELMER HOUSER

From the noise made by the wets in New York, New Jersey, Illinois and some other states claimed as dominion moist, one might imagine that those commonwealths were so saturated with and given over to anti-prohibition sentiment that the drys hadn't a look-in there To reassure ourselves, it is well to glance at a few hard facts.

First take a New York, which under Gov. Al Smith's leadership repealed its state enforcement law, throwing on Uncle Sam the whole responsibility for enforcing prohibition; then put out the fake referendum to see how many voters favored letting each state decide the alcoholic content of liquor that might be sold. What happened in New York? Well, the wet referendum secured the support of only one-third the voters of the Empire State! Senator Wadsworth, who misrepresented the Republicans of his state, was told to stay at home hereafter. Even in Greater New York, the very center of wetdom, Hamilton Fish, Jr., outspoken dry was re-elected to congress; and outside the metropolis, of the sixteen congressmen elected, thirteen are dry! State Republican Leader Koenig declares the election proved that a wet Republican candidate can no longer win in a state vote. So much for New York.

There's New Jersey, which with its two wet senators, one Republican and one Democrat, is supposed to be, as its governor tried to make it, "as wet as the Atlantic Ocean." Yet in the third congressional district of that state, supposed to be "dripping wet", with the Democratic candidate openly wet and the Republican candidate openly dry, the latter won out, "an overwhelming dry victory", says a double-column editorial in the Perth Amboy Evening News—which paper, by the way, is one of the most outspokenly dry dailies in the country. Not bad for New Jersey.

How about Illinois? In the straw vote referendum the wets mustered 260,000 fewer votes than they did in a similar referendum in 1922, and out of a possible 2,500,000 votes in the state they secured only about 450,000. Brennan, blatantly wet Democrat for United States senator, was overwhelmingly defeated, the combined votes of Smith and Magill, both dry, leaving him far out of sight. Two dry congressmen at large were elected by 345,000 plurality over the nearest wet opponent, and the congressional delegation is mostly dry. As a whole Illinois, spite of Chicago, showed a dry majority of 250,000. Thus Illinois.

In California (where William G. McAdoo, Democrat, did valiant work for the prohibition side), a dry governor was elected by 400,000, and by a big majority the state refused to repeal its prohibition enforcement law. Los Angeles biggest city in the state, went tremendously dry.

Missouri, though it has two wet senators at Washington (one the notorious Jim Reed) refused by a large vote to repeal its state enforcement law, as did Colorado. California, Colorado and Missouri combined, on votes to repeal prohibition enforcement laws, rolled up dry majorities totaling 370,000.

So it went all 'round. Of 35 governors elected, only two (Smith of New York and Ritchie of Maryland) are conspicuously wet, while 30 are avowedly dry. Ohio proved its dryness by re-electing Senator Willis (Republican) and Governor Doheny (Democrat), both dry as Sahara. Pennsylvania elected a dry governor by 719,000 plurality the largest ever, and gave Wilson, dry Democrat, for senator, 50,000 majority outside of Philadelphia where he was counted out by the Vare crowd. Over 70 percent of the Republicans and Democrats in both houses of congress are dry. And congress, on reassembling, voted the $30,000,000 asked for prohibition enforcement without batting an eyelid.

Yes; the United States ain't all wet—yet!—Michigan Christian Advocate.

Newspaper Show To Feature Press Mee

Michigan "home town" papers the publications which weekly carry intimate local news to the home folks of the state's many different communities, are going to stage a show.

More than 300 of these papers will be on display in a special exhibit which is to feature the annual meeting of the Michigan Press Association, at East Lansing on February 3, 4 and 5—the last days of the Farmers Week gathering at M. S. C. It will be the first time that Michigan weekly papers have all stood up side by side to compete an exhibit of the kind.

In addition to the newspaper showing, more than 100 samples of the job printing done in newspaper shops will form a separate exhibit.

While the displays are being planned primarily for the editors themselves who will be in session at the time, hundreds of visitors at the college Farmers Week will have the chance to compare their own "home" paper with those in other communities throughout the state.

Speakers of national reputation are scheduled to address the various meetings of the Michigan Press Association during its three day conference, while discussion on various trade topics will be led by prominent members of the association. The building of constantly improved and strengtened home papers, in order better to serve the local community, will be the general theme of the conference.

Schuyler Marshall, of St. Johns, and L. W. Feighner, of Nashville president and field secretary of the Michigan Press Association are planning the details of the meetings.

From Abe S. Hall

The other day we received from A. S. Hall of Tacoma Washington a nice letter full of Christmas cheer and containing much of interest to old friends in Michigan. Below we give it in full,

Tacoma Washington, Jan. 3, 1927,

"My Dear Friends indeed—We are pleased to report good health and more or less prosperity. We know you are interested in each of us, so make this letter personal. Lillie and myself are spending much of the time this winter with our youngest daughter, Dorothy who was western born—the only one of the family you are not personally acquainted with. She is Mrs. L, J. Voiles and has two children—a girl of three and a boy 2½ months old. Bertha (Mrs. B. W. Brintnall) lived in Seattle several years but later moved to Gig Harbor, 7 months ago, to be near our farm home. Her husband has an important position with one of the big daily papers, The News Tribune with a substantial salary. He is a graduate of Journalism from Seattle University. They have no children. Hazel, (Mrs. George W. Campen) also lives at Gig Harbor and has a son 8½ years of age and a pair of twins, boy and girl 3½ years old. Her husband is a graduate from the State College at Bullman, so you see we have five grand-children, and are proud of each and every one of them.

Bernice married two years ago while he was in Toronto Canada where he had lived five years. About one year ago he went to Miami Florida. His firm name is Rose & Hall architects and they have had much to do with building up Coral Gables, the noted winter resort. Our farm and real house is at Gig Harbor near Tacoma—a beautiful place to call home. We have a lovely marine view overlooking Puget Sound, one of the finest and most useful bodies of water in the world. Yesterday Alma Langdon and her son Rube and daughter Nellie called here. Alma and Nellie live in Seattle, while Rube lives in Tacoma; all are well and prospering. New Years Day we spent with Uncle Reuben Fuller and family here. He is past 80 years of age. Ed Hathaway and wife are both dead but Alta and Rolla are both doing fine Just received a letter from Mrs. George Cooper who is a sister of Bert Rickerd and lives in Los Angeles.

Mother (Sarah Ann Wilcox) is now with her daughter Mrs. Nellie Sears at Dalles Oregon, and she is quite well. The Sears' have a lovely house and fruit farm. Henry Wilcox lives in south Tacoma.

To date this season we have only had about three days of frost, and had roses and holly for decorating on Christmas day. Well, you do not expect more from a New Years card so we will return greetings by wishing you many happy years.

Ever your friends,
Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Hall"

Keep Your Batteries Up Fully

Over in Kansas the farmers have solved the problem for themselves in the way of electric energy which many if not all farm dwellers use throughout the state and which the Michigan farmers as a rule are expecting to use ere long to a large extent. The Southern Michigan Light and Power Company inside of ten years will have every section of this county covered as well as many other counties in the state, but in the meantime a good many men find storage batteries necessary, hence the business of the Delco Light, and other portable plants continues to flourish. As we were saying, over on the prairies of Kansas where the wind blows constantly they have rigged up wind mills hooked to their dynamos and automatically these windmills run about five hours every three days on the average, and keep the battery full to overflowing without the use of expensive gasoline and repairs for a complicated machine. Periods of insufficient wind to charge the batteries might occur at times during the summer season for five days in succession, but rarely—and in summer not much electricity is used. For the modern steel light running mills which catch every zerhyr on high, this appliance is very good. We have often wondered why some farmer with an inventive genius did not rig his mill for that purpose and save the expense of running the gas engine. The days of storage batteries are numbered in this country, since the Delco and other companies are exploiting batteryless plants which run continuously during the use of electricity on the premises. The electric problem of the man of average mechanical ability from now on, is an easy one at any rate, and he will clean his teeth by electricity before many years. The price per kilowatt hour should be cheapened as the big combines extend their lines to other more remote sections.

OLD LAW BASIS FOR ANNULMENT

Vanderbilt-Marlborough Case Logical When Law Is Understood, Says Bishop

FULL CONSENT NECESSARY

The declaration that the Vanderbilt-Marlborough marriage was null and void from the beginning is based on a law enacted centuries ago by the Catholic church for the defense of the dignity and liberty of woman, declared the Rt. Rev. Michael J. Gallagher, D. D., Bishop of Detroit, recently.

In pagan times woman had little freedom in choosing a husband. She was often one of the prizes of war

"The Church raised woman from the position of a slave and put her on a plane of equality with man, making her in the truest sense of the word his life-partner in marriage and queen of his home. To safeguard her freedom the church found it necessary to make coercion an invalidating impediment to matrimony.

"Even in the Middle Ages woman was often the sport of war or feudal strife. A robber baron would carry off some beautiful or wealthy woman and force her into marriage. When her father and his retainers surrounded his castle he would compel her to appear on the balcony and plead with them to desist from pursuit lest she be killed.

"In those days the Catholic Church was the only universal power. In the absence of any other central authority the poor and oppressed frequently appealed to her for protection. In consequence the Church authorities decreed that complete liberty was an essential condition of valid sacramental marriage. They created the impediment of 'raptus' which provided that when a woman had been carried off to some feudal castle she could not be married validly, even with her consent, until she had been set entirely free by her captors.

Aimed At Nobility

"Nor was physical freedom sufficient. There must also be no moral compulsion. Sometimes members of the nobility or people of wealth employed threats of disinheritance or disgrace to bring about matrimonial unions. To deal with such situations, the Church in the 12th century established the impediment known as 'vis et metus' providing that serious force or fear prevented the contracting of a valid marriage. Pope Gregory VIII mentioned this decree in his compendium of decretals published in 1230, nearly seven hundred years ago. In the present case, the sworn evidence of Miss Vanderbilt and other witnesses shows that she was not free to marry the man of her choice and that she was in love with another man. Consequently there was the invalidating impediment of 'vis et metus' force and fear in a serious degree.

"The law creating the impediment of force and fear," continued Bishop Gallagher, "was enacted at a time when anyone who was baptized was a member of the Catholic Church, for there was no other Christian Church. All Christian marriages were contracted before representatives of the Catholic Church and the Roman authorities sometimes found that some of these were invalid just as they occasionally declare Catholic marriages null and void in our time. The position of the officiating clergyman does not change the facts in the case. He cannot provide free consent if one of the parties is marrying out of fear, but conceals that fact."

No Slap At U. S.

Bishop Gallagher strongly denied that the Vanderbilt-Marlborough annulment is a slap at the courts of the United States. "Miss Vanderbilt is a French citizen; so is Monsieur Balsan. They were married in France. When they appeal to Rome for an opinion on the validity of their marital relations, what interference is there with American courts?

ANNULMENT COST EX-DUCHESS $240

"APART from lawyer's fees the annulment of the Vanderbilt - Marlborough marriage cost only about $240", says a Rome cablegram to the New York Times (Nov. 28). "Of this sum $40 went to defray the expenses of the diocesan court of Southwark and $200 for those of the Tribunal Rota at Rome".

The correspondent of the New York Times adds that "any poor man who cannot afford even these moderate charges can have a hearing before a diocesan court and the Tribunal Rota free of charge".

Chests for Children

A small chest proves a very handy article in the children's room. It is especially fine as a storage for toys and trinkets, for it is low and easy for a child to use. Then, too, it is not stationary and can be moved about the room to the most convenient spot.

And, after all, of what use is this pride of appearance, for which so much is risked, so much is suffered! It cannot promote health or ease pain; it makes no increase of merit in the person; it creates envy; it hastens misfortune.—B. Franklin.

Increase of Freight via Panama Route, Largely Due to Oil Shipments, Indicates Rise of United States to Leadership of World's Commerce.

By JUDSON C. WELLIVER

One of the striking evidences of America's rapid rise toward commercial and industrial leadership of the world, is the Panama Canal, will almost certainly handle more freight in 1926 than will Suez. For several years the two canals have been in a neck and neck competition whose implications are the more interesting because the Panama ditch is owned by the American Government, and that at Suez by the British Government.

Of course both Canals are open to the ships of all nations; and the competition between them is not only between the United States and Britain, but in a larger and even more significant view it is competition between old world and new world.

When the Panama Canal was opened in 1915, Suez was already transiting about 25,000,000 tons of freight annually. Almost nobody believed Panama could ever attract anything approaching such a volume. But during the war fear of German submarines in the Mediterannean caused many vessels to take the Panama route between the far east and European or American ports. This gave Panama its introduction and it has not only held but greatly increased its business since the war. In 1923 Panama transited 5037 vessels, against 4621 for Suez; Panama handled 25,160,000 cargo tons against 22,770,000 for Suez. This was the first year of Panama's lead.

A Close Race

The following year Suez barely exceeded Panama's tonnage; and in 1925 comfortably held its lead. But reports for 1926 to date indicate that Suez is losing, owing to Britain's industrial depression, while Panama is doing better and is pretty certain to resume the lead.

The present Suez Canal has been in operation nearly sixty years, Panama only eleven. Although few people except antiquarians know it, the first canal at Suez was built more than 3,000 years ago. It was in operation as early as B. C. 1380; how long before, is mere conjecture. Before the Christian era began the ditch had been built, destroyed, rebuilt, silted up and built up again, time after time. When Alexander the Great conquered Egypt the Canal was one of the oldest of engineering works.

Between 1904 and 1915 the present Panama Canal was constructed. It cost about $400,000,000, Suez about one fourth that sum. But Suez is a simple, sea-level ditch across a sandy plain, while Panama is a lock canal, the greater part of its length lying 85 feet above sea level, so that most of the distance from ocean to ocean is through an artificial freshwater lake.

Early Profits Unexpected

When Roosevelt started building at Panama, neither he nor any other prophet of optimism would have dared suggest that within its first decade the Canal would earn a profit. Its chief justification concerned the national defense, and the establishment of competition with the transcontinental railroads.

Although both Canals are open to shipping of all nations, British vessels constitute the majority of those using Suez (55.8 per cent), while American vessels are 54.5 per cent of those using Panama.

For 1924, ships of 21 nations used the Suez route, while 24 nations were represented in the maritime caravan at Panama.

The World War was not the only unexpected factor in bringing Panama so quickly to equality with Suez, nor the most important. The enormous increase in Panama traffic in 1923 was represented almost entirely by petroleum and its products, moving from California to the east coast and Europe. In the year ended June 30, 1924, tolls aggregating $24,290,000 were collected, of which $9,071,000 was from tankers carrying petroleum. An even more striking statement of the matter is that for the same year exactly 50 per cent of all tonnage through the Canal was between the two ocean fronts of the United States; that is, 13,500,000 tons; and of this, considerably over 9,000,000 tons, or more than two-thirds was petroleum. It was of course chiefly from California, en route to eastern refineries. In the succeeding year this petroleum movement fell off heavily; but for 1926 it is again increasing and the increase is likely to continue for many years. But for the petroleum traffic, the Canal would have shown a deficit in every year of its operation.

The enormous petroleum business has been in other ways advantageous to Panama. A constantly increasing proportion of maritime shipping nowadays uses oil fuel. Oil-burning ships seek routes on which they can most cheaply buy oil; and because California oil can be put so cheaply into the bunkers of vessels passing through the Panama ditch, there is a substantial inducement to prefer this route. This will increasingly favor Panama and militate against Suez, as the number of oil burners increases. Moreover, Panama's advantage will still further increase as the enormous oil resources of Venezuela, Colombia, and other South American countries are developed.

Great Service of Panama

If cheap petroleum has thus served Panama so well, Panama in turn has equally served the American motorist, who consumes most of the world's petroleum products. For Panama has brought the Pacific Coast petroleum to the eastern market at costs which, but for the Canal, would be vastly greater. Thus the Canal has given the United States the cheapest petroleum products in the world, and helped build the automobile industry and our modern highway system.

This mutually helpful relationship between the Canal and the petroleum users is the more impressive when one realizes that it was not even remotely anticipated at the time President Roosevelt started building the Canal. So late, indeed, as 1910, when Admiral Evans wrote his articles about the Canal and decided that it could not be profitable for several decades at least, he based all his calculations on the probable cost of coal for bunkering ships. He did not dream that merchant marines were on the verge of the revolutionary change from coal to oil. So he figured that, as there is practically no bunker coal in the countries bordering on the Pacific, that ocean could not compete, by way of Panama, for a greatly increased share of shipping. The oil development overturned the prophecies of Admiral Evans, and of all others who had foreseen that fuel problems would make Panama unprofitable.

Furs and Antivivisection

The hunter looked at the trap. It had been sprung. Marks in the snow revealed the desperate efforts that had been made by the trapped animal to escape this thing which was holding him, which produced such intolerable pain in his left forepaw. But the struggle had been untold, though that the wild fox had at last been released. It required no great insight to know how it had been done. "Poor little cuss", murmured the trapper. "I'm not sorry ye got away. Ye were a game little beast, ye were. But life ain't goin' to be easy fer ye, ever agin, with only three feet to go on."

Sorrowfully, the trapper opened his trap, took out the foot, and threw it away. The foot the terrified, pain crazed animal had himself gnawed off.

The man had witnessed what is not an uncommon sight to woodsmen and trappers. He knew the suffering that the wild things of the forest endure, that men and women may have warm coats for winter and that women may adorn themselves in summer. "Ain't no way to avoid it" he murmured as he strode away. "Wish I know'd one."

The suffering that animals must endure when furs are gathered to protect men and women seems to be necessary. The suffering that is inflicted when furs are gathered for adornment is unnecessary. Many of those women who in summer wear furs for adornment only are among those who oppose animal experimentation on the ground of the suffering it inflicts. The suffering of animals used for experimentation has been reduced to a minimum. What there is, is needful. It has for its object the preservation of uncounted other lives, both animal and human. But there is little of it.

As human beings are anesthetized before an operation is performed, so are the animals of the laboratory. As everything is done to alleviate human suffering in hospitals, so in the laboratory everything is done to alleviate suffering. But experimentation must go on. There is no other way by which accurate knowledge may be obtained of the effects of new drugs, of the effects of new methods, and new cures.

Experiments must be made on men or animals. It remains to decide whether we shall experiment on an animal or a human being; whether we shall value the life of a child more than that of a guinea pig.

Specific instances of experiments on animals that have saved the lives of thousands of other animals as well as of human beings are numerous. Pasteur, through his experiments on sheep, discovered the vaccine that has saved millions of sheep from anthrax and has saved great numbers of human beings Pasteur's experiments marked the beginning of all subsequent work and the development of serums and vaccines, and most of the serums and vaccines used today for the prevention and cure of disease were discovered through animal experimentation. Through experiments on dogs a method of curing rabies has been found. Through experiments on animals, insulin, the new and wonderful treatment for diabetes was discovered. That the cause of cretinism, a form of arrested mental and physical development, is thyroid deficiency was revealed through animal experimentation. The tale could go on indefinitely.

There is agitation here and there at this time to prohibit by legislative enactment all animal experimentation of whatever type. For the sake of the greater humanity, we must use reason. As a skilled surgeon inflicts pain on a human being in order to save greater pain so we must recognize that animal experimentation, even though it should inflict pain, must be carried on in order to save animal life and human life from suffering infinitely multiplied.

His Ideas Are Original

Rev. Elvin Magary pastor of the Woodward Avenue Presbyterian church Detroit maintains a Bible school and has a class of over 400 members. Among other things the church is engaged in broadcasting the Sunday morning services which covers southern Michigan pretty thoroughly. In connection with the Sunday school hour Rev. Magary maintains a question box to which not only are the congregation welcome but all his hearers over the Radio are invited to submit questions in writing and same if decent and logical will be answered the following Sunday morning over the Radio. For a short time last Sunday the question box proved very interesting and coming from a source supposed to be good authority it is a means of education to the masses. Among the questions read and answered were these:

"Why do the Protestant churches mix in politics to the detriment of their spiritual interests while the Catholic church holds aloof from the same? What is your opinion of the Ku Klux Klan?"

Answer—"The Protestant church as a whole does not endorse mixing in politics and has no particular axe to grind in these affairs. There are people in churches however who believe that politics should be managed according to christian ethics. The Catholic church is mis quoted in this sense. While it pays little attention to local politics yet it is most largely engaged in national affairs. As to the Ku Klut Klan such societies always have and always will exist. This is the only way certain classes of people can voice their boisterous approval of certain sentiments. These people like to join something and that is their choice. As for me I have no intention of joining any of them.

"If you endorse card playing, dancing and theatre going how shall you be distinguished from the worldly. Is the endorsement of such things playing with the tools of the Devil?"

Answer—There is absolutely no grounds for such a definition of any of these diversions. One of the greatest tools the Devil ever uses is self-righteousness and for a professed follower of the Savior to fall into this rut is scandalous and indecent. Self-righteousness was the besetting sin of the Pharisees. The "I am holier than thou" idea among church workers is quite apt to kill the effects of good motives, and is often a worse sin than indulging in "the Devils tools."

In your opinion is President Calles of Mexico liable to establish a permanent stable government?"

Answer—I do not believe President Calles is destined to be any more successful than his predecessors. His position is precarious and he has two very powerful handicaps to his success. First is the Catholic church which he has prosecuted and tried to eliminate from the country. The deep seated and simple belief of his common people in this church is undoubtedly going to put an obstacle against such government. Second—the common peons and others believe that Calles is seeking to establish a Soviet similar to Russia in Mexico which they will fight to the end. Again it is doubtful if Calles is great enough as a statesman to handle the situation. Should he prove himself equal to the task it will be the first instance for many years, and on the whole Washington is not looking to him to endure

In these questions and answers we have given the thought and text of Rev. Magary's answers if not the exact words. Rev. Magary would be pleased to have anyone who is interested tune in on his sessions and submit questions, which will be cheerfully answered as fast as he gets to them. Of course you understand there is only a limited time each Sunday for this service.

Super-power now a days is one of the most talked of things in the neighborhood. With electric lines criss crossing the country in every direction it is possible for practically every householder to get the current into the house and use it in some way—if not for more than a sad iron. A lot of bunk is indulged in concerning the transmitting of current from long distances. For instance a current travels from Chicago to New York City, a distance of 1,000 miles, and is practical for driving machinery, but it must be received at the starting point at 500,000 volts as the leakage must be taken care of and resistance. Hence we often marvel at sending our current 16 miles or more from Hudson or 23 miles from Jackson, but it come all right although rather weak in stormy weather. Experts tell us this is caused by faulty insulation in the village. If this be so, it should be repaired.

Announce Plans For M. S. C. Farmers Week

That more than 30 of the leading agricultural associations and groups of the state will hold meetings at East Lansing during the annual M. S. C. Farmers Week, Jan. 31 to Feb. 4, was disclosed here this week with the announcement of preliminary programs for the big conference.

The Michigan State Farm Bureau, the Crop Improvement Association, the Michigan Livestock Breeders and Feeders Association with its dozen or more special breed groups, and many other of the larger organizations will be included among those scheduled to gather during Farmers Week.

Meetings of these special groups will be held in the mornings, afternoons and evenings being reserved for the big general conferences which draw together all of the visitors from the different sections. At these general meetings, speakers of recognized standing as agricultural leaders will lead discussion upon vital questions of the day.

Tuesday, Feb. 1, has been designated as livestock day on the Farmers Week program, most of the meetings of the different livestock associations being scheduled for this day.

Special exhibits in all phases of agricultural work will be shown during the week. Practically all of the program features which have been successful in previous Farmers Weeks are included this year, along with new stunts, according to the college committee in charge of the work.

Barley Yields Prove Record For Michigan

Records of crops grown under the supervision of the Michigan Crop Improvement Association show that W. C. Pliter, Clio, has produced a record crop of Michigan Black Barbless barley in 1926. On a seven and one-third acre field of heavy soil, owned by Mr. Pliter, the barley yielded 62 bushels per acre.

Michigan Black Barbless barley is one of the valuable varieties of grain developed by the late Prof. F. A. Spragg, and the variety is being recommended by farm crops specialists at M. S. C. especially for planting on heavy soils. This barley has a short stiff straw which prevents lodging. The barley has smooth beards, which make the variety less unpleasant to handle than ordinary varieties.

Black Barbless barley yields well on soils rich in organic matter. Some growers have found that the short straw which is a characteristic of this variety is a disadvantage on poor soils. The barley is a good grain producer even on such soils but the short straw causes some trouble in harvesting with a binder

C. R. Oviatt, Bay City, secured 53 bushels of Michigan Black Barbless barley per acre on a nine acre field in 1926. Officers of the Michigan Crop Improvement Association believe that the yields secured by the two Saginaw valley farmers are records for this state. Twenty five to 30 bushels per acre is ordinarily considered a good yield of barley.

Lost Art of Cow Calling

The all but vanished art of cow calling is being revived in Indiana Before an audience of more than two hundred critical dirt farmers, the four premier cow callers of Owen county met in a voice to voice conflict to decide, once and for all, who was champion. The honor went to Otis Kinney, one of the leading dairymen of that section, and he was awarded a Swiss cow bell, presented to him by the Blue Valley Creamery Institute of Chicago. The Institute seeks to promote better dairying and is fostering these cow calling contests to arouse farmer interest.

The first event, open to anyone who thought he could make a cow come, resulted in nineteen entrants nine of whom were women. The judges, instructed to choose the winners, on the basis of applause, and "the probable appeal that the calling would make upon the cows as represented by the Judge" narrowed the choice down to four—two men and two women, and the finals were called off at the banquet which closed the session.

In calling cows, as in everything else, the ladies have their own technique. The two gentlemen callers relied almost absolutely on the volume of noise they could muster, but the ladies not so well equipped for long distance projection, fell back on "personality stuff" and called each roaming cow by name. Unlike pig calling, which is almost as indigenous to each section as the local dialect, cow calling is more or less universal. Cows from Maine to the Mississippi at least, came ambling amiably home to the luring cry of "so-o-o-o-o-Calf"

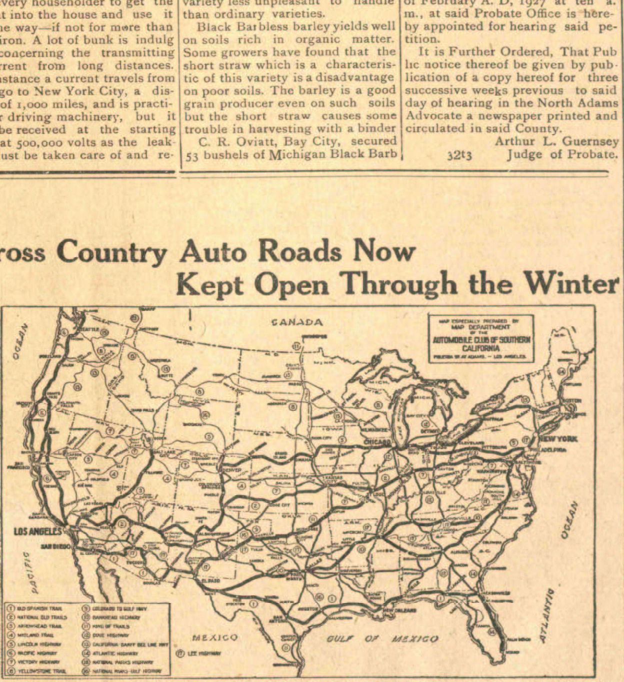
Cross Country Auto Roads Now Kept Open Through the Winter



The Federal government and the several states have made the automobile an all year instrument of pleasure and entertainment.

When winter comes with its chilling blasts and drifting snow the motorist need no longer put up his car and wait patiently for spring to bring back fair motoring days. All he need do, if he is in the north, is point the nose of the car southward. Soon he will come to a through transcontinental highway that leads to sunshine and flowers. The roads have been made not only adequate but splendid for all year driving.

This fact is revealed by a survey just completed by the Automobile Club of Southern California in conjunction with its thousands of sources of information from all over the United States. The club, in its survey kept ten cars on the road, each carrying two thoroughly experienced road information men. The cars went an average of 300 miles per day. This meant that the total per day of the cars was 3,000 miles. In a month they had traversed 90,000 miles and had covered every essential bit of road that motorists may use in crossing the United States in the winter time.

On the map shown above, all of the heavier roads are open through the year. Those that are farthest South are less troubled with storms and untoward local conditions than those in the North In order to facilitate the use of the roads during the winter months by the motorists of the United States the automobile club has instituted an unusual service.

Should any reader of this paper wish to make an automobile journey that touches Southern California over any of these roads, the Club will be glad to extend him every possible help and entirely without charge.

Prospective motor travelers should address the club at its headquarters Twenty Sixth and Figueroa streets, Los Angeles. If road maps are wanted, state the place of beginning, the destination and the route home and the principal cities that are to be visited going and coming. The Club will then send a full set of detail road maps covering the entire journey. If information about hotels, motor camps, hunting, fishing or other forms of sport are wanted, state this clearly in the request and the information will be sent.

If the visitor wishes, he may tell the club only his place of start and destination and ask the club to route him over the best route. The time that the journey is to be taken should be stated as routes vary in desirability with the several winter months.

Once the visitor arrives in Southern California the Automobile Club will make him a guest member giving all services for six months without charge. On the Pacific Coast the motor visitor will find paved highway completely covering the Pacific Slope from Canada to Mexico.

RELIGIOUS BORN OF REVOLUTION

Madams of the Sacred Heart Thrived on Persecution of French Gov't

Few persons, comparatively speaking, are aware that the academies for young women now conducted by the Religious of the Sacred Heart, in almost all the large centers of the United States, are practically a direct outgrowth of the French Revolution. Many things can be laid directly at the door of the revolution, but only those who are familiar with the history of the "Madames of the Sacred Heart," as they are sometimes known, would dream of attributing to it a distinct aid to the Catholic educational system in America.

In 1792 all religious orders were suppressed in France, with the result that Catholic education suffered what appeared to be a death blow. The Catholics however, were not content to let matters rest in this fashion. In place of the suppressed orders, most of which had existed for hundreds of years, they set about forming new societies which would be more likely to exist under the stern laws which then prevailed.

The Princess Louise de Bourbon Conde and the Archduchess Marie Anne, of Austria, with the aid of a Father Tournely attempted to found an order devoted to the education of girls and young women, but Father Tournely died before anything definite could be accomplished. He confided his ideas, nevertheless, to another priest, Joseph Varin de Solman, who some years later was able to put them into practice through the aid of Madeleine-Sophie Barat.

Began in Paris

In 1800 the first members of the new congregation entered upon the religious life in Paris and, a year later, the first convent school was opened in Amiens under the direction of Mlle. Loquet. Mother Barat soon succeeded Mlle. Loquet as superioress of this school, a post for which she was well fitted by both temperament and training. At this period the members of the order called themselvs the "Dames de l'Instruction Chretienne," as it was feared that any reference to the Sacred Heart in the title might provoke the wrath of the govrnment then in power.

From this beginning the order grew rapidly ,and in 1804 the second convent and school was established and Phillipine-Rose Duchesne, a former member of the Visitation Order, was received as a novice. This nun was destined to carry the order far beyond the limits of France and the Old World. Mother Duchesne and a number of other members of the Visitation Order found it impossible to carry out the ideals of that order under the existing laws and she and

VIGIL KEPT FROM DAWN TO DAWN

Ceaseless Tribute Paid by Cloistered Nuns to Blessed Sacrament

Day and night the city of Detroit hums and throbs with the sound of industrial activity. There is not a second in the entire 24 hours of the day when the city is quiet and subdued. Its ceaseless activity is a tribute to the modern god of Production.

Another form of ceaseless tribute which never flags for an instant is carried on in the city. It is not accompanied by sound and is known only to a few of the hundreds of thousands of city-dwellers. This is the perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament of the Eucharist—believed by Catholics to be the living presence of Jesus Christ—as observed in the Monastery of the Blessed Sacrament, Oakland avenue and Chicago boulevard.

Over seven centuries ago, in Prouille, France, St. Dominic, who had but recently established his order of Friars Preachers which was to play such an important part in the subsequent history of the world, founded an order of women known as the Dominican Nuns. Following in substance the rule of St. Augustine, these pious ladies took the three canonical vows of poverty, chastity and obedience; were strictly cloistered and devoted themselves to the recitation of the Divine Office besides engaging in manual work. Their history throughout the years is a long record of spiritual and cultural achievement.

OBLITERATED CITY TO BE GOLF GREEN

On the shores of Lake Superior, facing the wooded hills of Grand Island across the narrow bay and flanked by a willowy creek and a thicket of undergrowth, stood nearly a half century ago the populous village of Bay Furnace, county seat of Schoolcraft county. The picturesque site on beautiful Grand Island bay recently was reclaimed and on it a modern golf course has been built. The village was abandoned when a disastrous fire literally wiped the community off the map. Only an old blast furnace, rapidly yielding before the ravages of time, remains of the former county capital.

The many evidences of former habitation which were found at the old Bay Furnace site, three miles west of Munising, had led to some investigation into the history of the place. The bustling community which grew up around the ore smelting furnace constructed in 1870 was burned to the ground in 1877 in one of the most disastrous blazes in the history of the upper peninsula. When the Munising Golf and Outing Club was organized, the Bay Furnace site was chosen for the proposed nine-hole golf course. To O. E. Brown, cashier of the First National bank of Alger county, and member of the club the credit for data on the old village is due.

Following the discovery of iron ore in the upper peninsula, an attempt was made to convert it into pig iron near the ore fields. Blast furnaces were constructed at various points throughout the peninsula. Bay Furnace was built and operated by the Bay Furnace company, whose articles of incorporation were filed July 19, 1869. The incorporators were William Shea of Munising, George Wagner, J. C. Morse, Frank B. Spear and James Picklands of Marquette, John Outwaite of Cleveland and John P. Outwaite of Ishpeming. The company immediately proceeded to construct a blast furnace, which was completed and put into operation March 6, 1870. The location was officially described as Onota, Schoolcraft county, on Grand Island bay, 40 miles from Marquette.

The initial plant was a single stack furnace, according to historical data obtained from the files of the Marquette Mining Journal for 1876, then edited and published by A. P. Swineford. In 1872 a second stack was built and blown in December of that year. Neither of the stacks, however, operated with wholly satisfactory results until the summer of 1873, when Major H. S. Picklands, who later became a national figure in the iron industry, was appointed superintendent.

STORMS MEAN BIG WORK IN SALVAGE

After 28 years of dealing in wrecks and disasters and 64 years of steamboating, he's still on the job.

The man with the enviable record is Joseph King, Detroit manager for the Great Lakes Towing company.

When the ice begins to form in the lakes and rivers, when winter storms begin to collect their annual toll and when the folks on shore begin to worry about husbands, fathers and brothers on the lakes, it is then that Joe King has his busy season. His telephone rings. It may be some unimportant message and again it may summon the resources at the command of the veteran for a hurry-up rescue far out on Lake Ontario, or Lake Erie. Some ship may be locked in the ice there for the winter. Another may have been blown on to the banks of a desolate shore, and out there men are suffering from exposure, awaiting prompt action from the dealer in wrecks and disasters.

King is one of the multitude of sailor men who were born in Amherstburg, across the river, and like hundreds of Amherstburg natives became inbued as a small boy with the desire to sail the lakes.

The Civil War was raging when the boy applied for and received his first job on a lake-going vessel.

"It was the old sidewheeler Reindeer," he recalled. "Captain Fish looked me over. Men were scarce during war times and I suppose I was big for my age. He hired me as second porter. What a splendid man he was. I met him often years afterwards and was one of his sincere mourners when he died just two years ago at the age of 92."

In stores the number of male employes was 34,457 and their average daily wages, $5.21; number of female employes 30,471, average daily wake $3.18.

In hotels the number of males employed was 4,255 and their average daily wages $3.38; number of female employed 5,444, average daily wages, $2.70.

In restaurants the number of males employed was 5,516 and their average daily wages $3.66; number of female employes 30,471, average wages, $2.37.

The average wages of males in all industries of the state was $5.96; average wages for females $3.25.

JACKSON CLAIMS NEW CHESS CHAMP

The loss of 70 cents from his meagre earnings of $12 a week, gained from 16 hours' toil a day as bus boy in a New York coffee house, proved the entry fee to the hall of fame for Herman Steiner, youthful member of the Jackson Chess club, who today is one of the ranking chess players of America, and whom experts believe is destined to be a national champion some day.

The story of this young master of kings and queens, castles and knights, reads like fiction. Steiner was born in Budapest, Hungary, in 1905, and came to New York to live with a sister when 16 years old. At the New York cafe, where he worked as a purveyor of soiled dishes and silver, it was the custom of many patrons to gather in a small room and engage in games of chess as an after-dinner pastime. Steiner, while mopping up tables, and righting chairs, kept his eye on these contests in which experts often engaged. He grasped the rudiments of the play quickly.

One day the youngster sat in on a game that carried the usual 10-cent prize. He lost. A short time later he had seven defeats chalked against him, which meant the loss of 70 cents. This seemed a huge amount to extract from his savings. That night, smarting under his defeats, he determined to learn the game thoroughly, so that he might gain back his vanished wealth.

Steiner met Andrew Palmi, Jackson photographer, whom he had seen at the Cedar Point matches, and Palmi induced him to come to Jackson and learn the photography trade.

As a member of the Jackson Chess club, Steiner has not lost a single game, and he is regarded by his team mates as the man who will lead them to victory in a league composed of players representing Grand Rapids, Kalamazoo, a Battle Creek and Jackson.

TUBERCULOSIS MENACE TO POULTRY FLOCKS

Avian tuberculosis is spreading at an alarming rate in Souther Michigan and it is believed the time is near when farmers will have to start campaigns to eradicate the plague from their flocks, just as they are now fighting bovine tuberculosis.

Avian tuberculosis is present in the flocks in nearly all sections of the state, reports Dr. T. S. Rich, federal inspector in charge of tuberculosis eradication and hog cholera control, with headquesters in Lansing.

The situation in Michigan is so serious that Dr. Rich believes there is an opportunity for poultrymen and hatchery men to engage in the production of baby chicks that can reasonably be guaranteed free of avian tuberculosis. Hens can be tested in much the same way as cattle are tested.

MUSKEGON STILL FIGHTS TO SAVE ITS SAND DUNE

Despite the defeat in its original battle, Muskegon civic organizations will continue their efforts to save Pigeon Hill, a giant sand dune standing at the entrance of Muskegon harbor. The dune has been purchased by a sand company, which plans to remove the hill.

Until two years ago Muskegon assumed that it owned the dune. No attention was given to the feature of the land mark, which is said to protect the city from the storms that sweep across Lake Michigan. Then the property was sold and the plans announced for removing it.

Muskegon started a campaign to save the dune.

X-RAY SHOWS LOOT HIDDEN IN MOUTH OF DETROIT PICKPOCKET

An X-Ray exposed a pickpocket after he had taken a quarter from a woman patient in a physician's office in a Detroit building.

A man was sent by the department of health to the physician's office to have an X-Ray photograph of his facial bones made. The man divined the presence of a quarter in a purse belonging to a woman sitting next to him in the physician's office. Before many seconds had passed the quarter was no longer in the purse.

When the woman discovered her loss she complained bitterly to the physician, explaining it was her last one.

The X-Ray photograph was then taken of his face. But the man's face did not look so innocent on the inside as on the outside, Dr. Vaughan continued. Behind the upper lip in the ghostly looking negative was a strange round object, not ordinarily a part of the anatomy of man. The physician called his assistant and together they bent over the plate. Then the physician raised his eyebrows and said, "Ah—" "Open your mouth, please."

The quarter fell out.

TWO RAIL CAR FERRIES ADDED TO LAKE FLEET

Two new railroad car ferries will be riding Lake Michigan when navigation opens in the spring of 1927.

The Toledo Shipbuilding company at Toledo, O., has under construction for the Ann Arbor Railroad company a ferry which, it is said, will have a greater carrying capacity than any boat of this type previously built. The Grand Trunk Railroad company's newest car ferry, the Grand Rapids, is in the water at Manitowoc, Wis., where it was launched recently.

TRIBUTE IS PAID TO WOODSMAN

On the fly leaf of a history of Turtle Lake Club near Alpena is inscribed:

"To Buck—my friend and comrade of 40 years in the woods and who has added more to the sum total of the enjoyment of my life than any other man now living, with affectionate regard.—Harry S. New. Dated June 10, 1923."

"Buck" Beaufore, probably the most picturesque character who ever graced a hunting camp, died the other day, but his memory is of the type that will long linger in the minds of the men who knew him and these men come from all parts of the United States—a majority from Detroit.

"Buck" Beaufore was the playmate of some of the great men of the nation as has been indicated in the tribute paid him by Postmaster-General Harry S. New. Through it all, Buck Beaufore retained his simplicity of character and his originality of speech and it must be admitted that Buck had much originality along that line.

"Buck" was 78 years old. He was born on a farm near Courtright, Ont., on the St. Clair River, where as a boy be lived a life that called him out on the river hunting and fishing and later lured him to the north woods in the spring of 1872, and here he remained.

Down in Detroit the young man had made the acquaintance of Ed Gillman, later to be known in the hunting world at Turtle Lake as "Uncle Ed." He knew the mind of Uncle Ed and when Beaufore, then a stalwart young Frenchman, roamed over the north woods and pitched his camp over near Cold Creek, adjacent to the Turtle Lake, he knew he had discovered the hunting and fishing ground of Ed Gillman's dreams.

In the spring he went to Detroit and relayed the glad news to Mr. Gillman, with the result that next year the Gillman party established the Turtle Lake Club.

Previously Mr. Gillman had heard of the lure of this lake, but it remained for Buck Beoufore to bring him to its environs. Of course, Buck became a fixture when the club was established in 1884 and was chief guide and general factotum. He knew every stream in the region and almost every deer. The past hunt had been the fifty-fourth hunt of which Buck Beaufore had participated, 42 of which had been with the Turtle Lake Club.

A durable fabric is now manufactured in the Phillippines from the fibres of pineapple leaves. The material takes dyes well and is said to resist wear almost as stauntchly as leather.

WOMAN IN SHIP HURLED ON REEF

Mere man has no monopoly on the thrills of the annual race between winter and navigation on the Great Lakes. For instance, there is Mrs. S. E. Graewe, who has just returned to her home in Manistee after cheating winter and death on board the freighter Thomas Maytham, when that ship pounded for seven days on a rocky reef off Point Isabelle, in Lake Superior.

Leaving Duluth on the afternoon of November 30 with a cargo of grain, the Maytham soon was driven violently ahead of a strong norwester gale. Nearing Keweenaw Point a cross gale swept her about and churned up a mighty sea, pitching the freighter until her cargo shifted and officers and crew were powerless to control her. All hands lay on the floors of the cabins to avoid injury, as furniture crashed from one wall to the other and the ship all but rolled over.

After battling the storm for 24 hours the Maytham was finally brot to the lea of Manitou island, where she rode heavily at anchor for another 12 hours. The storm increased and the wind shifted until Captain Edward Rector ordered anchor up and nosed his craft westward past Keweenaw Point, seeking the shelter of its east coast. Snow was falling in blinding sheets and the commanding officer lost his way. He set his helm for what he believed was Bay Degree. Frequent sounding indicated several fathoms of water, although the character of the waves told of shallower water near. No land could be sighted through the dense, wind-driven snow. Then suddenly a great shock shook the freighter from stem to stern. She was poised on mid-keel on a rocky ridge in 18 feet of water.

ENGLISH WALNUT TREE IS FIRST IN STATE TO BEAR

An English walnut tree, planted at Albion years ago by Miss Margaret Dysinger, formerly an Albion florist, produced a small crop of nuts during the last season, which are now on display. Although the tree has reached a height of 30 feet, it has not been winter killed. It is believed to be the first English walnut grown successfully in this part of the state.

MICHIGAN LOWEST TAX OF ANY STATE ON CORPORATIONS

Michigan's corporation laws present difficulties to organizations with heavy investments in real estate, according to R. Wayne Newton, research associate in economics at Michigan State college. "Corporations calling Michigan their home paid out less of their net profits for taxes in 1924 than did corporations in the rest of the country," says Mr. Newton. "Those classes of concerns which have heavy investments in real estate paid the highest taxes in relation to their earnings."

Mr. Newton's statements are based upon figures obtained from the United States Bureau of Internal Revenue and upon reports of the federal bureau published recently. Similar figures for other years are not available.

Taxes absorbed an average of 25 per cent of the net profits from the 12,778 corporations which reported from Michigan for 1924, as compared with an average of 30 per cent for the country at large.

FIVE PRESIDENTS SERVE INGHAM CLUB SINCE 55 YEARS OPERATING

The Ingham County Farmers' club is different from most rural organizations, in that it doesn't believe in changing officers each time a new calendar is hung up. When it celebrates the anniversary of its founding on January 27, it will have rounded out 55 years of continuous existence, during which time it has had but five presidents and four treasurers.

Long term office holders sprung into being with this club in the second year of its existence. Amos F. Wood was elected president to succeed D. L. Cady, who retired and Wood was kept in office for 25 years. Others to serve as president were Colonel L. H. Ives, the only living charter member; Alfred Allen and Mrs. W. L. Cheney.

WANDERER MOLDS NEW RING STYLE

An unknown vagabond genius, a deserted from the army of the former kaiser, wandered into a modest Detroit jewelry manufacturing shop about fourteen years ago, looking for work in return for his meals.

This deserter was something of a twentieth century Benvenuto Cellini as a worker in metals. He worked in gold and platinum in the Detroit shop. In a short while he vanished.

But before he vanished the fugitive designed the orange blossom wedding ring and by so doing played an important part in evolutionizing one of the oldest industries in the world.

His orange blossom design has become almost universal. The plain gold band of a decade or so ago has become a drug on the market. Jewelers are melting those gold bands into ingots.

Chased marriage rings instead of the plain bands, are in use today for the first time since the downfall of the Roman empire. Christians eliminated relief from the marriage ring because of the practices of the latter-day Romans who engraved on their rings scenes such as their artists carved upon the walls of their temples.

TEST SHOWS SOIL BUILDING PROFITS

That successful farming and an adequate soil-building program can be carried on at the same time, and with no lack of profit, has been demonstrated during the last two years on the farm of Arthur Keesler, near Okemos, through work of Michigan State college soils experts co-operating with the owner.

Keesler followed in detail plans drawn up by Professor C. E. Miller, of State college, for use of fertilizers. The farm was chosen for the experiment because it was typical of the Michigan sand loam grounds which have been badly depleted in soil fertility.

Application of lime to all ground showing an acid recation was the first step in soil building. A thorough test of the soil permitted saving of some expense in liming, and also indicated that lime would have been sowed indiscriminately all over the farm without previous scientific investigation. Acid and ammonia sulphate were used as fertilizing agents, the latter being used in the spring as a top dressing on wheat.

In 1925, wheat on unfertilized ground yielded 13.6 bushels, and when acid phosphate was applied, the yield was 21.8 bushels. When Keesler added ammonium sulphate to the phosphate, he secured 24.9 bushels to the acre. This year, unfertilized ground produced 11.4 bushels and ground where fertilizers were employed 30.1 bushels an acre.

Since the Keesler farm contains 60 acres, experimental results are based on a large scale test area. Seeding of alfalfa and sweet clover will be the next step. These legumes, according to college experts, increase the humus content of the soil and make it possible to raise livestock on the farm.

"FORESTRY PRIMER" PUT IN HANDS OF TEACHERS

Through the co-operation of the Michigan Forestry Association and the Michigan State Department of Education, 45,000 copies of the "Forestry Primer" will be distributed to the schools of Michigan according to Prof. A. K. Chittenden, head of the Michigan State college forestry department and president of the forestry association. A copy of the "primer" will be placed in the hands of each of the 26,000 teachers of the state. The "Forestry Primer" sets forth the importance of forestry to the individual and shows the need for timber growing and fire prevention.

GIRL'S MEMORY REGAINS $2,200 DETROIT LOOT

The memory of Miss Agnes Coughlin, clerk in the Detroit police record bureau, led to the recovery of a watch containing 105 jewels stolen in Chicago December 2.

A record of the watch, pawned in Detroit for $500, was sent to the record bureau, as required by law, and Miss Coughlin remembered that circulars had been sent out from Chicago describing the watch and other articles stolen from the home of W. J. Gunthory, of Evanston, Ill.

Camels are believed to be the first animals used by man.

STATE CONSUMPTION OF POWER SHOWS HUGE GAIN IN YEAR

"The state of Michigan is thriving on a diet of electric power and its ability to consume it seems to be unlimited. During the twelve months ending with November, the state used half a billion more kilowatt-hours than in the corresponding previous year."

This was the report of D. E. Byerley of Adrian, president of the Michigan Electric Light association, following receipt of figures on the state's use of power, compiled by the United States Geological survey.

"No one type of service is responsible for the gain," Bierley said. "More electricity was used in home, more lines were built to reach towns and villages not previously served, more factories and farms harnessed their machines to motors, more streets and highways were lighted, more advertising signs, and more lighting contributed to retail merchandising."

FERTILIZER INCREASES STATE POTATO YIELD BY $50.00 PER ACRE

An average increase of 50.9 bushels an acre has been obtained this year through the use of fertilizers on potato test plots conducted by Michigan State college in co-operation with the farmers who specialize in growing potatoes.

The price of potatoes this year has made the increase worth more than $50 an acre. The cost of fertilizer used was $12 per acre. The average price of potatoes over the past 10 years, according to H. C. Moore, potato specialist at the college, has been 60 cents a bushel. Based on this year's results and the 10-year average price, the average profit would be $18 an acre.

Quality of potatoes," says Mr. Moore, "is increased by the use of fertilizers. The better quality is due to the tendency of the phosphoric acid in the fertilizer to force early maturity. Ripe potatoes have a better color and the skin is not bruised so easily as that of an unripe potato."

STATE COLLEGE IS IN NEED OF ROOM FOR ATHLETICS

Michigan State college needs more room for its department of athletics. Athletic chiefs are positive that additional space must be provided or the steady growth which sports have been enjoying at the Spartan institution must suffer.

The only solution which presents itself to those interested in keeping the athletic machinery humming is the construction of an addition to the gymnasium. The constant expansion of activites has made that structure a veritable beehive eighteen hours per day. Last year one department had athletes reporting at 4:30 a. m. in order to utilize the basketball court.

MEN UNABLE TO KEEP CARBUNKLE MONOPOLY

Hair bobing is to blame for an epidemic of carbuncles among women, according to a Kalamazoo physician.

Carbuncles until a few years ago, were an almost exclusively masculine affliction. The physician says he never treated a woman for a carbuncle until modern hairdressing fashion became prevalent. Now, he says, they are as common among women as men.

STYLES ARE STILL SLIM SILHUTTE

In the mid-season collection presented by French designers, and offered as the first harbinger of spring styles, little change is seen in line, the slim silhuette continuing.

Each designer has, however, put the individual stamp upon frocks and ensembles and by these signs are discovered variations of the costume theme that has lasted over several seasons and survived in the face of all predictions to the contrary. If changes there are to be, they are being arrived at so craftily that the transition gives little notice of its coming. Be that as it may, there are interesting things going on in the houses of the various Paris modistes and here are a few of them.

Jean Jatou, who has recently offered a new collection, presents a series of straight, youthful and exceedingly smart models.

The most characteristic feature of this collection are the decorations of flat sewn pleats, which are seen on coats, skirts and bodices and the great majority of morning and day frocks. These pleats can be very tiny, graded, or rather large and usually disposed en barre (although in skirts the pleats can also be vertical). These pleats superposed form geometrical designs, chevrons and festoons being the favorite.

In two-piece costumes and frocks made in crepella, jersey, crepe de chine and crepe marocain these decorations are seen both on the skirt and top and on the accompanying coat as well. The latter are perfectly straight with small collars only decorated with these pleats or insertions and trimmed with one or two chiffon flowers, usually in matching shades.

There is again a great number of striped jersey sweaters over woolen or crepe skirts. The sweaters are trimmed with the plain fabric. Jersey gold jackets also bound with crepe are frequently worn with them. The skirts are pleated or plisse with most of the fullness in front.

In frocks boleros are replaced by straight detached tops giving almost the same effect, but much straighter and narrower. The lines are square or rounded, bordered with a narrow band of the same fabric, which ties on one side in a small bow. Except for decorations of pleats they are devoid of all trimmings.

A series of practical straight frocks and coats are presented by Lelong for sports wear. The fullness in the skirt is obtained by pleats or plisses; the bodies are straight with a moderately high waistline trimmed with geometreal insertions, lines and small collars and cuffs often round. Several pullovers in plaid or striped woolens worn with white crepe plastrons. The coats are of the usual tailored type; the colors for these models are biege (lighter shades of it), grege, gray and white and many trimmings in pink and coral.

There are two kinds of evening frocks: Plain crepe Georgette frocks for dancing and very richly embroidered gowns.

The crepe georgette frocks have skirts with shaped and rounded superposed flounces and bodices trimmed with boleros, "rabats" or floating short panels at the sides. The decolletes are round and not too large; the colors for these models are white, black and red.

More habille frocks are also often black or white, but several are in pink, blue or light green.

Black chiffon frocks embroidered with strass are very effective, also those which have white tops and black bottoms.

PASTOR HIRED AS FORM AGENT FOR LENAWEE COUNTY

When Lenawee County, menaced by the corn borer, decided to employ an agricultural agent, it turned to the Rev. A. B. Van Schoik, of Holloway.

There isn't a wide difference between a rural minister and a county agricultural agent. A minister in the country, to keep his flock intact in these times, must help the farmer members with their every-day problems. A county agent, to be successful, must be a jack-of-all-trades and master of one, evangelism—the evangelism of a better agriculture.

Mr. Van Schoik was born and brot up on a farm near Findlay, Ohio. The oldest of eight children, he did not get a chance at more than one year of high school. But at 22, he entered Adrian college, determined to prepare himself for the ministry.

TWO DECLINE BID TO FACE TRIAL WITH LIVES AT STAKE

Two Detroit residents, one a restaurant owner and the other a butcher, received, along with numerous Christmas cards summonses to return to their native state, Albania, and there be tried for tereason. Both men, Alit Zenel, the restaurant owner, and Mino Grameno, the butcher, said they would not accept the invitations, principally because conviction of the crime with which they are charged carries with it the penalty of death.

They are accused with two other Albanians living in America, and Dr. M. Borja, former Albanian minister to Rome, of being implicated in a communist plot to overthrow the government of Albania. Dr. Borja is Zenel's brother-in-law.

MONTCALM TO DEFEAT BORER WITH ALFALFA

Montcalm county farmers will begin preparing this winter for the time when the European corn borer will invade this area. Farmers' institutes are being arranged to discuss alfalfa and sweet clover production. W. C. Cribbs, Michigan State college expansion specialist, is arranging the institutes in the hope of encouraging more Montcalm farmers to grow alfalfa. With a large alfalfa acreage, Mr. Cribbs believes, farmers can stop growing corn without material loss.

COYOTE HELD GREATER MENACE THAN WOLVES

The coyote, which has drifted into every part of the Upper Peninsula of Michigan within the last 15 years, is much more destructive of game than the timber wolf for the simple reason that there are more of them. The big wolf shuns settlement. Coyotes do not. The big brush coyote found in Michigan, and also in Ontario, is the largest race of the lesser wolves.

The increase in marriages in the United States of 0.3 per cent in 1925 was exceeded by the gain of 2.7 per cent in divorces.

GRID TEST STRAIN FAILS TO CUT WEIGHT IS ANN ARBOR DOPE

The "stress and strain" of football cited by critics of the great intercollegiate game is not so serious after all, if figures compiled at the University of Michigan are to be relied upon. The loss of sleep and weight throughout the "prolonged mental strain" of a football campaign seems to be a myth.

Only one man out of the forty odd players composing the Michigan gridiron squad suffered any weight losses through the past season. This was Walter Weber, fullback, of Mt. Clemens, Mich. Weber lost regularly a day before the games only to pick up his weight by the following Tuesday. His weight then remained constant until the following Friday, figures show.

In spite of the fact that men in rigid training usually undergo weight losses, four of Michigan's regulars gained regularly through the season. Gilbert, back, of Kalamazoo, put on three pounds. Molenda picked up a pound during the season, making his weight an even 220. Truskowski, Detroit, center, gained a pound. Flora, who carried one of the stiffest scholastic programs as an undergraduate in the medical school and who played in every game, added over ten pounds during the season.

PROPER DRESS TO FIGHT BITTER COLD

Just what is proper dress for outdoor sportsmen is reprinted here.

Don't bundle up too much. The besetting sin of the tenderfoot in the winter woods is that he overdresses. Ponderous mackinaws and sheepskins with which he attempts to protect himself weight him down and overheats him. They add fatigue to perspiration until, his vitality lowered, he suffers the very chill he tries to escape. His mistake is that he confuses purposes and tries to wear for hard hiking garments designed for driving or motoring.

Next to the skin wool functions best because it retains its insulation values when damp, better than any other substance. Of two piece of woolen underwear, the lightest weight proves very satisfactory. When it is very cold or you are inactive, wear two suits. This is more comfortably done with two-piece lingerie than with union suits; hence the election of the former style.

For the feet, three pairs of the heaviest wool socks are necessary; First, to insulate them from the cold; second, to absorb the moisture which most feet give out, even when chilled to the freezing point. A fourth pair, of silk, worn next to the skin, not only eliminates heavy wool but averts that chafing and blistering where the snowshoe harness rubs which frequently cripples the winter traveler. These socks should be white, to reduce the danger of infecting foot abrasions. At least one complete change of socks, preferably two, must be carried to allow changing and drying.

A flannel shirt completes the more intimate details of the winter wardrobe. The army shirt, by virtue of its material and pocket facilities, is as good as any and better than most. A light sweater jacket and a sleeveless army sweater, either or both according to need, are excellent suppliments to this shirt when the weather is extreme.

Long pants shortened about three inches to give clearance, are most comfortable for snowshoeing and all other woods activities. They are less picturesque than the riding breeches affected by all novices, But one bends each knee 10,000 times walking ten miles and that's too many times to stretch the cloth of well-fitted breeches. Also the tight leg of the breeches checks the circulation of the blood to the feet, where it is most needed, and retains too much body heat around the thigh, where it is not wanted.

This leads to the second seeming paradox—canvas or khaki pants are better than woolen pants. Snow does not stick to them, melt and wet them. They keep off the wind, something the heaviest woolen pants the market affords cannot do. If more warmth is required, an extra pair of drawers, clinging close to the leg, are more effective than a sheath of 32 ounce mackinaw flopping around it.

SEEK GOLD DUE TO INDIAN LORE

If you take your vacation in the vicinity of Bellaire, Mich., this summer, carry a spade along.

To participate in the game it would be advisable to get acquainted with John Steiner. Mr. Steiner at present is building cottages for H. D. Smith, owner of Fisherman's Paradise. But as soon as spring thaws the ground sufficiently to permit of ploughing he will be on his farm, behind his team, when you arrive to ask permission to help him dig for Indian gold.

For more than 20 years he has been cognizant of the legend that on his farm was fought a battle between three Indian tribes for a hugs sum in gold paid them for their lands by the United States government. He has heard from the descendants of these Indians of the quarrel over the distribution of the cash—of how the tribe which held the money buried it on his place and then died to the last man rather than divulge the secret.

Certainly no piece of land in Antrim County has been turned over quite as much as John Steiner's, even before the story had got abroad that when the timber was first cut on it Indians in the vicinity showed an odd interest in the proceedings. When John Steiner's father, who bought the place 53 years ago, started to pull the stumps the nearly redskins squatted about him and watched operations with the closest atention.

MEETINGS SCHEDULED IN 1927 AT STATE COLLEGE

Nine state, national and international agricultural organizations will hold annual meetings at Michigan State college next summer, just prior to the conference of the International Country Life association, which is slated for the first week of August, and will be attended by delegates from a number of European countries.

The last week of July and first week in August will constitute a "gala season" at State college, and President Butterfield is arranging for large groups of farmers from Michigan and from other states as well to remain on the campus for all the sessions. Farmers Day, usually held on July 31, will be moved forward to August 2, 3 or 4, he explained.

RECORDS SHOW HOW PIONEERS DEALT WITH CRIME WAVE THEN

A parallel to the present crime situation in Detroit is brought to light by the discovery of the original documents relating to the formation of the "Pleasant Valley Police Club" in 1868. This was a citizens' vigilante association designed to clean up Livingstone county, which immediately after the Civil war was notorious as a hotbed of violent robberies. The energy of the members succeeded in reducing crime to a minimum.

The papers were found recently by Alfred O. Dunk, Detroit, on the old Puritan farm, which for more than 68 years was the homestead of Squire Beach at Brighton, Livingstone county.

The document states that "We, the citizens of Pleasant Valley and cicinity, feeling the necessity of taking some efficient measures to prevent if possible and to bring to justice the perpetrators of the various crimes so often committed in this vicinity, such as horse stealing, burglaries and all similar offenses against the law and good order of society, do adopt the following by-laws."

The by-laws called for a maximum of 100 members under the usual officers, each paying $1. The officers and directors were empowered to appoint 12 efficient men or riders "whose duty it shall be when ordered by the officers to use all possible diligence in searching for and bringing to justice the perpetrators of any crimes which may have been committed." They were also given autnority to appoint additional riders in the event of an emergency.

Riders found remiss in their duty were required to pay a forfeit of $5.

Speaking of Sunday schools reminds one that Will Hays, former postmaster General of the U. S. was once a small town S. S. Supt. When the Big Producers wanted someone to clean up the Film business they selected Will for the position but Mr. Hays recently admitted in a N. Y. speech that it "can't be done." This is not surprising because movie proprietors find it necessary to put on all classes of shows in order to prevent the box receipts from falling below the profit line. One of the Big Producers recently questioned 18,000 show managers concerning the kind of pictures they wanted and 60 percent said that they desired "vile suggestive" pictures in order to please the public while 40 percent desired "mixed" pictures. Occasionally the producers present a desirable picture such as "Ben Hur" in order to sait the church people and the Protestant ministers because the Producers know that a compliment from a preacher or from a churchman has considereble influence with a certain portion of the public. As a rule moviedom is a good example of Bunk in Bunkusia.

Most Songful Trees

Elms are the most songful trees we have. I always think so when I see one alone in a level meadowland. It springs up so spontaneously, it is so straight growing; and yet it reaches out dreamful arms all ways and they muse a little and bend from the joyous one up-springing trunk. Oh, yes, they are songful.—Josephine Preston Peabody.

Have the Wrong Idea

Too many people think that opportunity is a chance to get money without earning it. As a rule they have another chance to think, but too often they still fail to think straight, and finally reach the conclusion that the world's against them.—Grit.

Much Admired

She was fashionably dressed and ornamented. After examining her carefully the doctor finally said, "Madam, you have acute tonsilitis." The patient blushed and admitted, "Yes, so many have admired it, but what I came to see you about, doctor, was why my throat hurts so badly."—Capper's Weekly.

Final Judgment

"We do not enter into correspondence as to the reasons for rejections," snickered St. Peter, as he kicked the protesting editor down the elevator shaft.

$1,000 IN REWARDS for Poultry Thieves!
The Michigan Business Farmer
1000 for Poultry

Let's Drive the Poultry Thieves out of Michigan

Stealing chickens, ducks and turkeys from the farms of this State has proven so profitable that we are fighting an organized gang of bandits who use motor trucks to rush their spoils to city markets. It has got to stop.

The Michigan Business Farmer has set aside ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS ($1,000.00) to be paid in rewards to anyone, including state and county police officers, who secures the evidence and conviction of poultry thieves who steal chickens, ducks, turkeys or guinea fowl from its subscribers.

FIRST REWARD PAID

Frank Watkins, R. 2, Holly, Michigan, was paid the first reward under this offer. The thief he caught served 30 days in the Oakland county jail and paid $65 fine. Frank has $50 to show for ridding Michigan of one poultry thief.

An editor of a certain Michigan newspaper sprung a new one on us the other day when he made the claim that the decadence of the rural church is responsible for the great number of divorce cases. He goes on to illustrate it something like this. "In the pioneer days the early settlers were as a rule particular about their morals and their first duty was to erect a rude church which was attended quite regularly but today says the editor, people in the country as well as city dwellers are forsaking the church and cleaving to the badly balanced and often lewd movies." He says movies, autos and radio have changed the whole bunch from law abiding decent respectable citizens to something else—a term which we do not care to use. Now if this is so—we are in a bad way. Excitement and lust is taking the place largely of christianity and common decency. That's what we thought often while visiting some of the bathing beaches and the vaudeville theatres last summer but of course everybody for themselves as the old lady said when she kissed her cow.

There is a tendency among ice men to put too little sawdust in the bottom of the ice house when putting up ice for the coming summer. Never less than a foot and 18 inches is better of sawdust should be put in to lay the first layer on. This will keep out the air which has a tendency to melt the bottom layers by creeping in. Contrary to some ideas an ice house cannot be made out of any old ramshackle building or even a rail fence pen. The successful ice keeper must be practically as air tight as a silo. Perfect insulation is the only way. Then a large pipe leading out from the lowest part of the floor will serve for drainage. This should be connected with a trap similar to a house sink for keeping out the air.

Leaf Lettuce Ahead In Nutrition Tests

Leaf lettuce proved to be a much better food than head lettuce in experiments which were conducted recently at M. S. C. by Doctors Marie Dye and John W. Crist, and Mr. O. C. Medlock. The lettuce was the only source of vitamin A in a diet fed to groups of rats.

When vitamin A is not present in a ration, there is little or no increase in weight of the animal which is fed such a deficient diet. The experiments conducted at M. S. C. indicate that there is a marked relationship between the amount of vitamin A contained by that vegetable.

Rats which were fed on leaf lettuce grew much better than those fed on head lettuce. Rats fed on the greener leaves from the outside of the head lettuce developed much better than those which were fed only the inside leaves. Some of the rats which were fed the inner leaves died in from five to six weeks This indicates a marked deficiency in vitamin A in the inner portions of head lettuce.

"They wouldn't touch it. Father's dogs are always well trained. They won't take food from strangers."

"We might throw it over the fence and let 'em find it themselves. There's a chance that they'd eat it then. If you can think up anything better, speak now, or ever after hold your whisht. It's your move."

After a long pause Roberta bethought herself of the Achilles heel of the household at Birchwood, and indicated a possible line of action, provided some disposition could be made of the dogs. For an hour they plotted, with occasional argument and a vast deal of giggling. Over one inspiration of Roberta's they laughed until their eyes were wet and proceedings halted while they wiped the tears away.

"Bob, you're a marvel! Piggy testified, still gasping. "I flatter myself I'm some strategist, but I never would have thought of that in a million years! I told you your time would come.!"

"Don't you think it will work?"

"Work?" It'll be a riot! Swift and sweet and simple—and so innocent! Wise as—or, Lord!—Wise as serpents and harmless as doves!" With that they doubled up again in throes of laughter.

CHAPTER THIRTY

Sunday they rested from their labors. Janet went circumspectly to church, thereby acquiring further merit in the village, but neither Roberta nor Piggy stirred out of doors all day. That night, for the first time since embarking upon this adventure, he luxuriated in long hours of sleep.

Monday morning he set off alone in the car, on a recruiting expedition, covering a wide expanse of country and eventually visiting Worcester. Late in the afternoon he returned, ran his car into the barn and lifted from the tonneau a long, narrow, covered wooden box, a smaller box, a saw, a parcel of nails, and several gunny sacks. Each of the latter was securely tired at the top for the retention of something that squirmed and uttered protest.

Setting the bags on the floor, he got a hammer from the tool kit of the car and pounded the smaller box apart. As Roberta, contrary to her usual custom, did not immediately appear, he sounded a frourish on his motor horn and set about fitting into the larger box partitions made from the small one. When at last his co-conspirator joined him, he looked up with his roguish, small-boy grin.

"Got 'em."

"Did you?" Her smile was sober.

"All from the neighborhood, too—farmhouses. Bought 'em, prices from a quarter up. One cost a whole dollar. What's the matter? Headache?"

"No—I'm worried. Peter, Clif's here."

"Here! In the house?"

"Oh, no. But he must be staying somewhere near Jaffrey, probably. I don't believe father would ask him to stay at the house. I went over to the store this afternoon for something Janet needed quickly for cooking, and I met him. He was on horseback."

"He didn't recognize you!"

"N-no, I think not. I wore my veil, of course, but—he stared at me hard. There aren't many people so small as I am, and I think he knows I must be around here somewhere and is looking for me."

"Let him look. By morning it will all be over except the shouting."

"If things go well tonight. But suppose there's a slip? Suppose something goes wrong and we have to wait? He may suspect and—Anyway, I've been wondering whether it wouldn't be better to hunt him up and tell him?"

"Not on your life!"

"Why not?"

"Because he's a—" Piggy pulled himself up just in time, on the verge of telling Bob that the man she was going to marry was a quitter. Stumbling, he caught his step again. "He's a fifth wheel to this coach. We're rolling along all right and anybody else would just be a nuisance. Besides, there's no telling what he'd do. He was dead against your trying this last week and he may be yet. He might throw a monkey wrench into the machinery at the last moment."

"That's what I'm afraid of. If he objects, I'm sure I can talk him around. I did once. But if we don't tell him and he finds out—"

"How can he find out? You're Mrs. Smith of Seattle, with two old family retainers to prove it. Roberta Scott's gone where the woodbine twineth. He may whangdoodle around awhile, but if you sit tight he'll grow tired of it and go to look for you somewhere else—especially after we pull off this stunt tonight."

"We-ell . . ." Though impressed by his confidence, Roberta did not fully share it. "You really think it would be better not to take Celia to town at once? We could drive fast all night and be there by morning, couldn't we?"

"Sure," he said derisively. "We could be perfectly obvious and give the whole thing away like a shot. We blow in from nowhere, take a house for a month with an option for the winter, stay a week, and vanish between dark and daylight. Celia disappears the same night. A car's easy to trace and they'd nab us within 24 hours, with the devil to yap. Nit! Not! We stay right here. We're gentle strangers in deep grief, with only a mild and passing interest in local kidnappings. The thing breays wild excitement for a few days, sleuths all over the place, clues that lead nowhere, unwary wanderers by night arrested on suspicion and released again, and everybody supposing that whoever got Celia beat it for the dim distance—naturally. The kid will have to keep out of sight, but she's been shut up so long that a little while longer won't matter. When our month's up, you regretfully decide that we can't stay all winter, we smuggle her out—"

"But how, Peter? How?"

"Oh, there are lots of ways. We'll decide that when the time comes. When we have her safely landed in Brooklyn with Janet, you'll go to some New York hotel, register as Rhoda Swift or Rebecca Schwartz or something, and write a polite letter to Whangdoodle asking how much longer he intends to postpone that wedding. I'll wash this stuff off my hair—by the way, it's turning sort o' green; you'd better retouch it tomorrow—get home from my hunting trip, and everything will be lovely. There isn't a hole in this scheme now, Bob, and don't you go poking one."

"Well—if Clif doesn't poke one himself. He's a persistent person."

Her uneasiness would have been relieved, and her already high opinion of Piggy's perspicacious forethought elevated by several notches had she overheard a conversation in the village store that afternoon.

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE

Nixon, vaguely suspicious of the diminutive, erect figure in widow's weeds and determined to upturn every questionable stone, had recognized the store as the inevitable clearing house of local gossip. Therefore, ostensibly seeking toilet soap, he visited this mart of general merchandise.

"You seem to have quite a large stock," he said pleasantly to the salesman. "Looks as if you must do a good business."

"So so, for a village."

"You don't have many strangers here, I take it."

"Not this time o' year. Some Boston folks have houses here for summer, and the tavern's pretty full then too. You stayin' there?"

"No, I'm staying at the Jaffrey Inn. I'm just riding around today to see the country. Never was up here before. But I saw a lady on the street just now—a little bit of a woman in deep mourning—who looked like a friend of mine. Do you know who she is?"

"Musta been Mis' Smith. She was in here 'bout five minutes ago, getting some flavoring extract. She's just come. Rented the Finlaw house."

"Oh, she's taken a house?" Nixon doubted that Roberta's slender resources would run to this. "How long has she been here?"

"She come — let's see — Tuesday mornin', I guess 'twas, in her car, with a shofer. Nice common feller he is too. Not a bit stuck up. She's got a hired girl here, too—funniest old Scotch woman ever you see! Sharper'n a razor! Gosh, but she's a caution when it comes to gettin' her money's worth! She's honest, though. I give her a penny too much change the other day when I was in a hurry, and she brought it right back. Says she's worked for the family ever since the master, as she calls him, was a little feller. He died a couple o' months ago, out West some're, and they say Mis' Smith is all broke up. Guess she must be pretty well off, though. She never kicked a mite about the price o' the house. Paid a month's rent in advance and said she'd stay all winter, if she liked it."

"H'm—well—evidently she isn't the person I thought she might be. I didn't see her face," said Nixon, and went his way, satisfied that he had been mistaken.

Yet the gait and carriage of that small, shrouded figure haunted him. They were so like Roberta's.

Piggy was more troubled by Nixon's proximity than he had admitted to Roberta, for he was by no means sure that Scott had not installed the young man as guard over the dove-cote in his own absence; in which case it might be wise to postpone action.

Turning this over in his mind, he strolled down to the tavern after dinner, as was his nightly custom, and there he learned that a stranger on horseback had passed through the village during the afternoon, stopping briefly at the store. Thereupon he lost no time in repairing thither himself.

"Hello, Jonesy!" he said to the junior salesman, who was preparing to close up for the night. "Hear you done a thrivin' business today. What did that swell guy on horseback buy? A collar button?"

"Naw. Soap."

"Who is he?"

"I dunno. Said he was stayin over to the Jaffrey Inn an' ridin' 'round to see the country. He seen Mis' Smith out here on the road an' thot she was somebody he knew."

"Did he?" Piggy looned up with an interest easily interpretable as hope. "Maybe he's from out home. Did he say anything about Seattle?"

"Naw. I told him all about her an' he said she couldn't be the one he thought, then."

"Oh," said Piggy, concealing relief with a prodigious yawn. "Gee! I'm sleepy! Gettin' to be a regular rube. Guess I'll go home an' hit the hay. There ain't nothin' else to do up here."

With this he sauntered away, but quickened his step when he had turned into the lonely road leading to the Smith domicile.

"It's all right," he assured Roberta. "The Whangdoodle told 'em the story of his life at the store this afternoon. He's staying at the Jaffrey Inn."

"Why do you call him the Whangdoodle?"

"Well, he 'mourneth for his lost love,' doth he not?"

"Idiot," said Roberta. "Stop blithering. Go up and change your clothes."

He donned his brown overalls and canvas hunting coat, while she put aside her flowing symbols of bereavement in favor of the cloth suit and close hat in which she traveled, as less likely to impede progress thru the woods than her long crepe veil. She took the precaution, however, of wearing the latter until they had left Fitzwilliam behind, though they did not start until the early-retiring occupants of the two houses they had to pass were sound asleep. Piggy had decided to take an indirect route, via Troy and Ballou, in order to avoid the centers of both Fitzwilliam and Jaffrey. It was somewhat longer than his usual road, but safer from observation.

Warning Janet to keep the lower lights burning until eleven o'clock, when she was to extinguish them and light Roberta's bedroom for half an hour, thereafter waiting in darkness for the return of the relief expedition, they crawled silently away in the car. Various aids to the execution of nefarious purpose were stowed in Piggy's pockets, and under the rug, at Roberta's feet in the tonneau, was a demijohn filled with gasoline, beside it a long narrow box from which came sounds of alarm. Added to these was Janet's dark coat for Celia, who might conceivably need it.

Thus armed and panoplied for high adventure, they slid over the deserted roads, unobserved. Deep in the woods, nearing their destination, Piggy quenched his lights and ran the remainder of the distance slowing and in darkness, save for the dim radiance of the moon filtered through the trees.

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO

Just before reaching the fork leading up to Birchwood he turned the car around and drove back a few feet to a spot previously selected for this purpose behind a thicket of young birch at the roadside. By day it would have been visible, but now only the pale trunks of the saplings could be seen, the dark automobile lost in the dense shadows of its background.

Leaving it there, headed toward home and safety, they walked on down the road to the familiar trail, not wishing to arouse the dogs until certain preliminaries had been accomplished. Climbing was slow, owing to Piggy's burdens; in one hand he carried the demijohn of gasoline, and the other firmly gripped the box on his shoulder, from which plaintive sounds still issued at intervals. Roberta, behind, had Janet's cloak and the torch, the light of the latter enabling them to choose their footing.

At the summit there was a delay while Piggy cut a small branch from a tree and fashioned himself a bludgeon, brandishing it once or twice to test its weight. He also pried up the cover of the box, lightly secured by a couple of nails, so it could be easily removed. Then, puckering his lips, he faced Birchwood, and the crisp, calm night air was slit with the strains of his pregnant refrain.

Celia, who had listened for it in vain the night before, wriggled joyously in her bed and wondered whether she dared flash back an answer. Twice through it sounded, and was followed by a fragment from a more modern and widely popular ditty, the significance of which temporarily paralyzed the prisoner—"There'll be a hot time in the old town tonight." Somethink was going to happen!

Undeniably something was, but none of them foresaw all the events of that memorable night, for not even Piggy's prescient perspicacity had warned him of Clifford Nixon's insomnia.

Harassed by perplexity and doubt; unable to reconcile Scott's report of Roberta's conduct and conversation in New York with his own knowledge of her plans; remorseful because he had failed tomeether,yetassuringhimhimself that he could not have done otherwise in the circumstances; apprehensive that she might have returned to Paris without seeing him, and equally apprehensive that she might still be plotting Celia's release, with disastrous consequences to himself and his business should she succeed—for in this event Scott would inevitably assume that her fiance had been in league with her and act accordingly—Nixon found inaction galling and sleep unthinkable.

Not having provided himself with reading matter, he decided late in the evening to take a walk, and almost without conscious intention his feet led him toward the center of disturbance, Birchwood. Only the fact that Piggy, under the aegis of his lucky star, had chosen an indirect way prevented their passing him on the road. Noticing that the house was dark, Nixon walked on for a short distance and was about to turn back when he heard a shrill whistle from the top of the hill at his right. He looked up, wondering whether any one lived there and what the tune was that the fellow was whistling so lustly. As the refrain was repeated, he remembered the words.

"Poco, Poco, keep thine eye
On the fair-haired girl, for she is sly;
You'll be sorry by and by
You ever had a daughter."

Nixon stopped short. Significant, that! Could it be a signal? When he heard the melodious prediction of an immediate period of feverish activity, he plunged into the brush and began scrambling up the steep hillside. Not knowing of the rough trail within a few feet of him, he fought his way in the darkness thru a thick undergrowth, stumbling, slipping, occasionally falling, but striving ever upward, more and more convinced that at last he was about to find Roberta. The noise of his own progress deafened him to that of the conspirators rapidly descending on the other side of the spur, but he heard the salvo of the dogs and turned his course in their direction, making what speed he could in his effort to reach Roberta before she had time to take whatever mad action she might contemplate. Juniper and wild blackberry vines stabbed him, impassable thickets of brush delayed him, but, breathlessly swearing, he persevered.

All unaware of the danger at their heels, Roberta and Piggy arrived at the barbed wire barrier with their burdens and concentrated their attention on the dogs, who were running to and fro on their own side of the fence, barking furiously.

"Get behind me," he said, wirecutter in one hand and bludgeon in the other. "I may have to brain these brutes yet. If they're ugly, hop thru to the other side. I'll keep 'em out. Got the top loose?

"Yes; I'm holding it down. Ready?"

"One, two, three—go."

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE

Roberta lifted her hand from the box over which she had been stooping and tipped it toward the woods. As the cover fell, five terrified and spitting cats, tailed bushed and fur on end, streaked into the underbrush. At the same instant Piggy clipped the lower strands of wire, with a sibilant "S-s-sic 'em, boy! S-s-sic 'em!" Yipping, the three dogs tore past, to scatter in pursuit of game never resisted by any proper canine.

He cut the remaining lines, pushed Roberta through, and hastily pieved the clipped strands with lengths of wire from his pocket, drawing them loosely into place again. This done, he snatched up his demijohn.

"No run! Those pups may be back before long and they'll raise the devil when they can't get in. Hustle!"

They ran downhill for a short distance through cleared woodland, jumped a brook at the bottom, and raced up the slope to the terrace, but stole around its graveled soundingboard to the back of the house, where they listened a moment before crossing the moonlit yard to the woodshed, in the shadow of the stable.

Here they worked swiftly and almost noislessly, carrying armfuls of wood around the corner of the shed to the back of the barn, until they had accumulated a sufficient pile.

"Now you get behind one of those bushes at the side of the house, where you can see both ways," Piggy whispered, and began pouring the contents of his jug over the wood, while she sought the shelter of a clump of leafless shrubs affording an adequate screen in the moonlight. A few seconds later he joined her.

"Yell!"

"Fire! Fire!" Roberta screamed. "Celia, Fire!"

Celia, awake and waiting, heard the call.

"Mother!" She shook the dormant figure beside her. "Mother! Fire!"

Now fire, as Roberta well knew when she suggested this coup, was the one thing of which everybody at in terror. Owing to the isolated position of the house, they were dependent upon their own resources for protection, and while the premises were well provided with hose and a large water tank, as well as with portable chemical siphons, nothing could have been better calculated to throw the household into confusion.

"Fire?" Mrs. Scott gasped, rolling out of bed. "Where?"

"I don't know," Celia breathlessly replied. "Somebody screamed."

Her mother seized a kimona, thrust her feet into slippers, and scuttled down the hall, sniffing for smoke as she ran. From the dining room she saw a glare in the direction of the barn, and heard a bevy of shrieking maids tumble down the back stairs into the kitchen. The habit of a lifetime demanded male direction, and she ran out into the yard, screeching for the gardener, whose quarters were over the garage. He emerged shortly with a chemical siphon and took charge of the situation, dispatching the maids for hose and other siphons.

Meanwhile, Celia, suspecting Roberta's hand in this diversion, slipped a petticoat over her nightdress, wrapped herself in a warm bathrobe, found shoes which she did not stop to fasten, threw a gown over her arm, and ran downstairs to the terrace in front of the housa

"Roberta?" she called. "Roberta?"

There was no reply, and she ran to the side, wondering whether she had been mistaken in the voice she had heard. "Roberta?" Behind the barn she saw the glare of the fire and heard her mother's wild clamor for the gardener. Desperately she ran along the terrace to the other side, and behind the shrub Piggy said:

"There she is."

They sprang out and joined her.

"Oh, Roberta! I knew you'd come!" Celia flung herself upon her sister, but Piggy caught her shoulders and spun her around to throw Janet's long coat over the rosecolored bathrobe.

"Don't talk! Run!" he commanded brusquely. "Down the road."

Down the road, accordingly, the three sprinted. Near the highway Celia tripped over an unfastened shoe, staggered, and tripped again on a corner of a coat much too long for her, falling heavily. When they picked her up she cried:

"Oh Oh! My ankle! I've sprained it!"

"Darn!" said Piggy. "I knew something was due to happen. It's been too easy. Never mind. You've got to make it now. Take her on the other side, Bob. It isn't far. Come on, kid, be a sport!"

Wincing and sobbing, as much from excitement as from pain, Celia hobbled along, supported by the other two, to the padlocked gate. With some difficulty and delay they hoisted her over it, and Piggy carried her down the road to the hidden car. Over on the hillside the dogs were assaulting high heaven with their alarums.

"Those pups sound agitated." Grinning, Piggy turned an expert sportsman's ear in their direction before starting his engine. "They must have treed a cat or something."

CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR

The dogs had treed a cat. Also Clifford Nixon. In his search thru the woods for Roberta, he had failed to notice a small, furry, fleeing creature, but heard a quick rustle and a growl in time to glimpse in the checkered moonlight the purposeful advance of two dogs. Leaping upward, he caught the limb of a tree to swing himself out of reach and found the territory disputed by a cat claiming squatter's rights, in defense of which sundry wounds were inflicted before the first settler, with feline maledictions, sought higher refuge.

Whereupon the trushy wardens of a forbidden demesne encamped at the foot of the tree, presently reinforced by a third, and gave tongue.

Their chorus, to which the cat supplied a florid coloratura obligato, prevented his hearing the outcry at Birchwood, though he saw the glare of the fire through the trees while sucking his scratched hands, and cursed long and volubly. For the same reason he caught no hum from the road as Piggy started his car, pulled up through the tricket, and sped away by the same indirect route he had taken in coming, Celia, clapsed in Roberta's arms on the back seat, sobbing between tears and laughter as she heard the story of her rescue.

Neither was the purr of the engine detected at Birchwood, where confusion was thrice confounded. The gardener, running behind the stable with a siphon, had found the bonfire and smelled gasoline. Assuming an attempt to fire the barn, he had subdued the flames with a spray before telling Mrs. Scott of its apparent purpose.

Her hysteria increased rather than diminished by this information, she cried distractedly:

"How could it be set on fire? How could anybody get in, with the dogs—Where are the dogs?

The excited group of servants looked about blankly, until some one noticed the barks on the opposite hill and exclaimed:

"There they are How'd they get over there? Maybe they've got the man!'

The gardener ran for a lantern, and Mrs. Scott continued:

"I don't see how anyone could get in. Celia, how could— Why, where's Celia?"

"I ain't seen her at all," said the cook, and the others echoed: "I ain't seen her."

"But she must— Why, she woke me! She heard somebody scream fire. She must have been out! Oh, the dogs! They've attacked Celia! Find her! Find her!"

Even as Piggy lifted Celia over the gate, the gardener ran with his lantern to investigate the quarry of the dogs. During his absence the house and its immediate vicinity were hastily searched by the maids, who whispered among themselves, as their paths crossed, that maybe she had run away. Maybe she had set the fire herself. They didn't blame her; anybody could see that the poor thing wasn't crazy—or was she, after all? Opinions wavered, changed and changed back again. They hoped she had escaped.

Mrs. Scott, all this time, ran hither and yon, wringing her hands in the certainty that the dogs had killed her daughter and that the gardener would return bearing her mangled remains.

Instead, he brought Clifford Nixon, who was exceedingly wroth, requiring no oracle to tell him what interpretation Scott would put upon the situation from which he had just been rescued. Livid and grim, he knew that the only possibility—remote at best—of saving from practical annihilation the business interests he represented lay in prompt and decisive action. Now he must find Roberta, and see to it, moreover, that Celia was returned to the fold.

His theory of the raid, privately confided to Mrs. Scott, added the final touch to her deorientation, and she collapsed into a chair, feebly quavering:

"Roberta? But where—but how—but—"

"I don't know where or how, but she did it," he said curtly. "Where's the telephone?"

She indicated it and he called up officers of the law at Jaffrey, Dublin, and Peterborough, Keene, Worcester, Greenfield and way points, notifying them that Miss Celia Scott had been abducted and warning them to watch roads and trains for her. He then put in a call for Scott himself; but long before the New York connection was made, Piggy, stealing darkly into Fitzwilliam, had lifted Celia from the car and carried her to the bedroom prepared for her.

There, by the rays of a single candle, lest lights at that hour should be seen and reported, he skillfully bandaged the sprained and badly swollen ankle with the adhensive plaster that was always a part of his hunting outfit.

"There, that's a pretty good job," he said. "Now you go to sleep, and for the love of Mike don't show yourself at a window in the morning! The whole countryside will be looking for you."

Leaving Celia to Janet's ministrations, Roberta followed him out into the hall, where another candle burned dimly. But not so dimly that he could not see her glowing eyes.

"Peter, Peter, what a wonder you are!" she said softly.

To his own utter astonishment Piggl swept her into his arms and kissed her—unscientifically, it is true, but more or less satisfactorily.

EXTREME YOUTH MARKS ANN ARBOR TRACK MEN

Extreme youth marks the candidates for this year's freshman track team at Ann Arbor. In addition to youth, some of the candidates have other earmarks of being able to uphold Michigan track traditions. A number of the candidates are 16 years or younger, which gives the mplenty of time to develop.

PINES AND SPRUCE URGED PLANTED

W. C. Cribbs, Michigan State college expansion specialist, is encouraging owners of farms fronting on trunkline highways in north-central Michigan, to plant an acre or more to White Pines and Norway Spruce.

Such a grove can be started at a cost of $16.50 an acre, including the trees and labor in planting them. Mr. Cribbs recommends setting the pines 8x8 feet, and interplanting these trees with Norway Spruce, spaced 4x4 feet.

The spruce could be cut in seven to ten years, Cribbs estimates, and sold for Christmas trees. The pines would remain as a permanent grove, and the spruce would more than pay for the cost of establishing the pine trees.

Under this system of planting Mr. Cribbs believes it would take 2,042 spruce and 680 pines an acre. He says the pines can be purchased from the forestry division of the state conservation department at $3 per 1000 and the spruce from the forestry department of Michigan State college at $4 per 1000.

BIRTHPLACE OF AUTHOR IN ANTRIM TO BE TORN DOWN

On the mainland in Antrim county, just across the east arm of Grand Traverse Bay from Northport, stands the homestead where Rex Beach, author of "The Silver Horde," "The Spoilers" and many other best sellers, was born 49 years ago.

The place has been owned by Fred E. Clark of Chicago, but recently was sold to Fred Brooks and people in the vicinity say soon is to be torn down.

The house, which is at present unoccupied, lies some four miles west of Atwood, where the author obtained his preliminary education.

STATE PREXY'S TIP WELCOMED IN EAST

New York is talking about a corking new foot ball idea that has come out of the "West." The scheme involves the mitigation of over-emphasis of foot ball by having each university develop two elevens, as nearly eaqual as possible.

One of the teams would play a capacity schedule of home games and the other would fill every Saturday with out-of-town contests. The plan seems to have originated with President Little of Michigan, and talk throughout the Western Conference indicates that the reaction is favorable.

Excellent results which it is thought would follow the carrying out of this idea may be set down as follows:

There would be no necessity for student migrations and all the attendant evils of absence from classroom, drinking and the like.

There would be the opportunity of wider participation in 'varsity foot ball, there being two teams and substitutes instead of one.

A final game between the traveling and the home elevens would arouse probably greater interest than almost any inter-collegiate contest, and this would help the cause of intra-mural sports, one of the big problems in all universities.

There would be less idolization of star players.

STATE COLLEGE PLANS A TWO-DAY POULTRY COURSE

Two-day poultry schools for producers have been planned by the extension specialists of the Michigan State college poultry department. Location of the schools will be decided upon by the agricultural agent in the counties where they will be held.

Housing, feeding, disease control and sanitation, brooding, breeding and care of the baby chick will be covered.

$500 GIFTS SHOWER FOR YEAR'S FIRST BABY

In place of a silver spoon in his mouth, Clifford Skinner, Jr., Kalamazoo's first 1927 baby, found about $500 worth of presents awaiting him when he arrived at Bronson Methodist hospital one-half minute after midnight. The prizes were donated by Kalamazoo merchants for the first child born in the county this year.

FAMED SEED POTATOES DISTRIBUTED IN NORTH

Northern Michigan farmers now have 100 bushels of Bliss Triumph seed potatoes which promise to grow into a profitable business for the owners.

There is a big demand in the South for Bliss Triumph seed. The Southerners have been attracted to Michigan through the rigidity with which its seed certification regulations are enforced.

SHIELD SCIENTIST TO SAVE CLUES

A human hair was lost on the floor—one single hair—and a clue to a slaying vanished. Again, a piece of string on a drawer was brushed aside and a jury reported a disagreement because of it.

So a combination of the exactness of chemistry, the hard-headedness of rural jurors and the fineness of points of Blackstone has entered into making C. L. Bliss, toxicologist of the Michigan Department of Health at Lansing probably the hardest man to reach in Michigan. In fact his own wife can't slip up behind him at his desk, cover his eyes with her hands, and say: "Guess who?"

Word is taken through the door labeled "Toxicology" that you are there and in a moment a slender man with gray hair and a long white laboratory coat appears and conducts you into this guarded scene of lost hairs and broken strings. The man is Mr. Bliss.

After learning something of his work, one realizes that the precautions taken in admitting visitors are as vital to the success of his work as the accuracy of his labor with test tubes.

Under a state law, some 20 years old, the department is required to furnish the facilities of its laboratories and skill of its chemists to police officials, coroners and county officers where there is suspicion of foul play in connection with a death. Tests are made for poisons, blood stains are analyzed and criminology otherwise aided.

But back to the lost hair. There had been a murder and a State trooper made an all-night drive to deliver to Mr. Bliss one hair. This single short hair had been found on a piece of iron believed to have been the weapon of assault. A fingerprint had been taken from the iron, also the single hair.

Was the hair a human hair? A step in the solution of the crime—a step that would make the lone fingerprint of value—rested on that single hair.

A too-efficient janitor or a careless caller swept the hair from the desk. All night Mr. Bliss was on his knees on the floor of the laboratory, flashlight in one hand, magnifying glass in the other.

He found three hairs. But which was the hair? The archstone in the frail structure on which solution of the case was hoped to rise was lost. The crime today remains unsolved.

WATERWAY MEETING IS AT MUSKEGON THIS WEEK

Two governors, three former-governors and prominent men from various parts of the country have been invited to attend the meeting of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Association to be held at Muskegon the third week in January.

"Finish the job in 1927," is to be the slogan of the association at the regional conference. By "finish the job" the association means completion of negotiations of a preliminary nature.

GRAND RAPIDS MAN WITHIN DAY BAGS FIVE WILD GEESE

To bag a wild goose in Michigan is a feat which entitles the lucky nimrod to maintain an air of arrogance and aristocracy throughout all of a cold winter. But to bag five geese out of one flock puts the happy hunter in a class of evclusive lonesomeness.

Michigan puts a bag limit of five on goose hunters, but it's a theoretical limit. The number of hunters who have had an opportunity to bring down a limit of the big fowl any day during a season is extremely limited.

Among the lucky few who, however, have succeeded is M. E. Davenport of Grand Rapids. Davenport's five birds were lesser snow geese which are smaller than Canadas, but which wild fowl hunters count more delicately flavored.

A flock of the big white wings came down in a field near Davenport's summer home not far from Greenville.

ARMENIAN WOMAN WEAVES OWN RUG

Here and there in Detroit exotic customs and ways of living still survive among those of our residents whose habits were formed in far-away machine production, the weaving of a rug by hand seems like a poor investment of time and energy.

But Mrs. Deshlus Sairenian, still thinks she is profitably employed—if not from a monetary standpoint, at least from a sentimental one. This Armenian woman is weaving only a small rug. Even at that she is going to be engaged in tying knots for three or four months to complete her small piece.

For centuries it has been a custom in Mrs. Sairenian's family for its members to weave their own rugs. Sometimes a half-dozen women and children would work a year or more to complete a single rug. These toilsome possessions were handed down from generation to generation. The family had its own designs; carded its own wool, colored its own yarn with vegetable dye and preserved its own secrets of craftsmanship.

ENGLISH PHEASANTS PUT ON JEWETT'S RESERVE

E. H. Jewett of Detroit has introduced several pairs of English pheasants into his game reserve lying north east of West Branch in Ogemaw county. The bird is smaller than our Chinese ringnecked pheasant and native grouse. The climatic conditions in its new habitat are similar to those of the bird's native country.

CLARE BUSINESS MEN PLAN SUMMER RESORT

A group of Clare business men is considering organizing a company to purchase the Clare mill pond and power dam, with the land adjoining, and develop it into a summer resort.

The pond is the best fishing spot in the section. It is fed by the spring water of Tobacco river, one of the best trout streams in central Michigan.

To shoot a projectile to the moon, it would be necessary for it to have a velocity of seven miles a second. The average big gun can drive a speed of only about one one-hundreth of that rate.

PUBLIC'S RIGHT TO FISH IS UPHELD

Riprarian fishing rights, a long disputed question between the state and commercial fishing interests, seems well settled following a decision of the State Supreme court that all navigable streams are open to public fishing and hunting.

Prior to 1921 the statute books carried a law for many years which gave owners of Great Lake frontage exclusive fishing rights up to a certain distance from the shore. Commercial fishing interests succeeded in creating a monopoly of the business by taking over valuable strips of shore line.

In 1921, however, John Baird, directory of the department of conservation, succeeded in having the law repealed. Although the fishing interests have made two efforts to have the statute re-enacted, the conservation department with the aid of the Michigan sportsmen, has been instrumental in keeping the waters open to the public.

NEW FOUNDLAND MINE IS PURCHASED BY FORD

Purchase of an iron ore mine at Snow's Pond, Conception Bay New Foundland, for $100,000 by Henry Ford, Detroit automobile manufacturer, was reported. The mine, which has not been operated for several years, was examined by experts last summer. It i ssaid diamond drill equipment is being shipped from the United States by the new owner in preparation for a resumption of mining soon.

MUSKRATS QUICK TO BUILD FAMILIES

One of the most important advantages that the muskrat farmer reaps is the prolificacy with which these animals reproduce themselves. It is not uncommon for either the stream or marsh rat to bring into life three litters during the year. These litters number from three to nine and in rare instances a family of 13 youngsters have been brought into the world to gladden the hearts of Mr. and Mrs. Muskrat. While it is not probable that in Michigan, where the warm season is comparatively short, that the members of the first litter produce new life themselves during the one season, yet further south such an eventuation is not at all uncommon. The owl is one of the most destructive enemies of the rat, the two being nocturnal in their habits.

While mink and otter feed upon the rat they are, themselves, valuable fur bearing animals.

TAXES THREATEN DEATH OF HISTORIC INDIAN CITY

Launching a campaign to preserve the historic Indian village of Peshaba town, in Leehanau county, which annually attracts thousands of summer club willetaoshrdluetaoshrdletaoshrdl visitors, the Sutton Bay Boosters club will seek ways and means to provide finances for the red men who, in recent years, have been relinquishing their property for back taxes.

The matter may be called to the attention of the state legislature, says Asst. Postmaster Whitmore of Suttons Bay, and an attempt made to remove the Indian properties from the state tax rolls.

GRAND RAPIDS WOMAN WRITES TWO BOOKS FOR CHILD READERS

Mrs. Venner H. Brace, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin H. Hanchett of Grand Rapids, whose verses, composed merely for the entertainment of her juvenile friends, won for her a wide circle of youthful admirers, recently has published two books of children's rhymes, "I Wish I Were" and "The Tale of the Cross-Eyed Kits."

Mrs. Brace, formerly Miss Elizabeth Hanchett, found pleasure in arranging bits of rhyme for amusement of the children who delighted to gather at her home to listen to her recitals. Her circle of acquaintance among the children widened rapidly. She adopted the practice of scribbling down the verses which won the greatest approval of the children.

$51 PER CAPITA IN TAXES PAID U. S. BY STATE'S RESIDENTS

In the fiscal year that ended June 30, 1926, Michigan, with 3.41 per cent of the population of the county, paid 7.96 per cent of the total internal revenue collected by the government. In dollars and cents, this means Michigan, last year, paid $51.33 per capita as compared with $21.97 per capita for the nation. These figures are contained in the annual report of the commissioner of internal revenue.

The total internal revenue taken from Michigan was $225,629,148, made up of $122,570,115 in income taxes and $103,059,032 in miscellaneous taxes. This total was exceeded by only New York and Pennsylvania, and Michigan's per capita was higher than Pennsylvania's.

STATE SHOWS BIG GAIN IN USE OF GAS FOR HEATING

Michigan is turning to manufactured gas for all varieties of heating jobs at a rate unprecedented in the record of the gas industry in the state, Chas. R. Henderson of the Michigan Gas association reported to members of the association.

Annual consumption of gas in Michigan increased 44 per cent in six years and the number of consumers showed a gain of 40.6 per cent, while the average monthly consumption of gas per customer has increased 7.23 per cent, Henderson said.

Vickrey Appeals for Million To Aid Armenian Quake Victims

C. V. VICKREY

MORE than a million dollars will be required to meet the needs of earthquake victims in Armenia, according to Charles V. Vickrey, general secretary of the Near East Relief, in a nation wide appeal for the observance of International Golden Rule Sunday.

This sum will be required to provide adequate medical attention, food, clothing and supplies to the thousands of families made homeless by the earthquake and to care for the nine thousand orphan wards of the relief organization in the Caucasus until June, according to the appeal.

Hundreds of villages have been laid waste and many of the huge orphanages caring for the children have been razed. Others are unsafe for use until repairs can be made. Meanwhile children and American relief workers are living in tents in a region in which blizzards and heavy snowstorms are frequent at this time of the year.

Reports from the various villages in the earthquake zone indicate that the inhabitants have been forced to construct rude dugouts under ground to protect themselves from the wild, winter weather. With shocks that have continued intermittently for two weeks there has been considerable loss of life in these fragile dwellings.

STYLES CHANGE DAY FROM DAY

There can be no question about the shortness of skirts, the narrowness of the silhouette, or the increased height of the hat. And yet, changes register from day to day.

Interest just now centers in the mid-season fashions. Among those contributing fascinating models are many well known designers, who employ the brilliant hues of scarlet combined with white, or the softer pastel shades in self-tone, according to mood and mode.

One thing can be said, however, in a general way, and this is that lines are little changed, and the slim figure continues popular. Fullness is given to all models not by the cut of the frock, but by the employment of inserts, usually of pleats contrived in most original ways.

For sports wear is shown an entire series of woolen jersey frocks having straight bodices and skirts elaborately plisse. Over them are worn sleeveless velvet coatees of the same color, but different in shade. Such coatees promise to be very fashionable in the spring and summer; they are quite plain and their own trimming is the buttons, by which they fasten. However, almost as fashionable as these will be jackets.

The smarter ensemble consisted of a dress in red flaminga, with straight lines trimmed with "plit deligieuse" made to give it a bolero aspect. The straight matching woolen coat is trimmed with dows of silk stitching disposed in the same manner as the tucks on the dress; it is lined with black crepe, a color with which it will be smart to line beige and light colored ensembles.

For the afternoon are a large number of dresses in black crepe de chine. An outstanding one of these has a flat flounce skirt (such skirts giving a tunic effect are quite a feature), draped up on one side and trimmed with gold jewels, which match the earrings and bracelets worn with it. The bodice—and this, too is characteristic of the collection—is trimmed with a jabot or facing at the side. Skirts have draperies repeating this movement and placed either on the same side or on the opposite one.

By her choice of accessories is the woman of fashion known. And to the selection of these trifles much thought and deliberation is given. It is no small task to keep up with the changing whims of fashion in relation to the "smaller things." A pin that is smart becomes creapened by over-popularity and within a week loses its exclusiveness. The shoulder flower for one occasion is small, for another huge, while the number and type of the many bracelets vary according to the occasion upon which they are worn. All these are points which the wise woman realizes and which guide her in her choice of accessories.

An interesting note is the attention that is being paid to the collar and the belt. The unfinished neckline is hard to find. Bows and ties of the material seem to be the most natural way out of the difficulty, though ever and ever so many collars of lace are to be noted in the past few weeks.

Naturally winter brings the higher collar, but the season can not take the whole credit for the number of high, closely fitted collars one sees on smart women. Some fasten in front with tiny buttons, and hug the chin as closely as they decently can. Others involve deft manipulation of scarf ends. But all make some effort at raising the collar standard.

The fat lady and the wide belt should be kept as far apart as the east and the west, but the narrow-gauge miss should wear a wide girdle of crushed suede about her hips at every opportunity.

These bright-colored belts of red, brown, green or bright blue are charming with sport frocks or jersey, kasha or crepe, particularly when they match the tiny untrimmed hat in color. Some of the newest models have designs in nail heads, or are perforated in simple designs. Often oriental clasps are used very effectively on these models.

The shoulder bouquet simply will not pass. It has grown larger and more exotic for evening, and rather smaller for day. The day flower is usually of the material for evening contrasts.

Every fur coat has its boutonniere, natural or artificial, and the gardenia is an easy winner. Two or three natural ones are just about as right as you can get in this respect.

In evening attire skirts are becoming longer, and gloves manifesting themselves.

The newest hatpins are long and daggerlike. Many are of crystal or tortise shell and stick up like a rabbit's ear. Those encrusted with real diamonds are nifty indeed.

Much has been said about fringe, but it is absolutely correct this year for day and evening, and you can't play it too hard.

ATHLETE IN ROLE OF PEASE MAKER FOR RIVAL TOWNS

Bennie Oosterbaan, star Michigan athlete, played a new role. Bennie was selected to establish peace between the neighboring villages of Montague and Whitehall.

As in the case of many other neighboring towns, there has been more or less spirited feeling between Whitehall and Montague. Montague defeated Whitehall High school at foot ball early last season, and Montague came over to Whitehall to celebrate. Then Thanksgiving day Whitehall evened the count and defeated Montague, 3 to 0. Naturally, Whitehall went over to Montague across White Lake to celebrate. Montague was prepared. Eggs were thrown and fights resulted.

Business men of both cities who regret the feeling decided to have Oosterbaan, the Michigan foot ball captain for 1927 and idol of all Muskegon county foot ball players and fans, establish peace. Edward D. Skeels, the state representative and a resident of Whitehall, invited Oosterbaan to speak at the meeting of the White Lake Exchange club. The players of both schools were guests.

BEETLES HOBBY OF FURNITURE MAKER

When Arthur W. Andrews, an art furniture maker, of Detroit, began to collect beetles some years ago, he merely was taking up a new hobby to beguile some of his leisure hours.

Today his collection of ioleoptera, as beetles are caller in scientific language, numbers over 100,000 specimens; he is associate curator of the University of Michigan museum and is acclaimed one of the outstanding experts on beetles in the United States.

As for colar, the hues of the rainbow are not as varied as the tints of the different species. If a case of beetles is placed under a light, it will glitter and glisten like a tray of gems. Some beetles have bodies of cooper hue and one can scee flashes of red and gold in them; others are green or brown and some have bluish invender bodies with opelescent tints.

Some are frankly ugly. The sexton or burying beetles, for example, have dangerous-looking horns and a fierce appearance. They are equipped for the function of burying food for their young. A group of these beetles will gather around a dead bird or animal in the woods and dig up the earth around it until it gradually sinks into the ground. Then the beetles lay their eggs upon it. When the baby beetles hatch out they find a square meal literally under their noses.

Small beetles are kept as pets or "domestic animals" by the industrious little ants. These tiny insects assume mastery over beetles many times larger than they. It has beei observed that when ants return from an expedition they are often greeted by their clumsy pets that frisk and gambol about them much as dogs do with men.

From Mr. Andrews one also learns that beetles and other bugs are strongly inclined to violate the Volstead act. Beetles, butterflies, moths and many other insects will fly for miles to get one little sip of alcohol. The trouble is that they become drunk that they can neither stand nor fly. They lie on their backs with their feet up in the air, an easy prey to their enemies.

Paper can be made from practically anything that can be pounded into pulp.

HUGE SANCTUARY ACQUIRED BY STATE

The establishment of what is hailed as the finest game sanctuary, forest reserve and public hunting ground in all of Michigan has been announced by the department of conservation. This will be located in the southern part of Creboygan county and the northern reaches of Otsego county.

For years the state has maintained an area of 9,620 acres in this vicinity as a forest reserve known as the "Pigeon River Forest." In addition to this there have been 12,800 acres in Otsego county under lease from the Yuill Brothers Co., of Vanderbilt, for a number of years as a game preserve. It was here that elk were first introduced into Michigan and the herd now numbers about 300 animals.

The commission has been attempting to secure a permanent addition to this area so that forestry could be practiced upon an extensive scale, a fair sized game sanctuary established in the heart and this to be surrounded by a public hunting ground. Negotiations have now been completed making this possible. The land in question is one solid block lying to the east and north of the Pigeon River forest. It comprises 12,900 acres, and was purchased from the Richardson Lumber Co. of Alpena at the rate of $3.75 an acre. The land lies between the Pigeon and Black Rivers and will give the state control of about four miles of shoreline on the Black and 10 miles upon the Pigeon, both in the heart of the best trouting waters.

BUS RATE WAR PEACE MOVE BY STATE FAILS

An attempt by the Michigan Public Utilities Commission to bring a cessation in the rate wars being waged by bus lines operating between Detroit and Toledo and between Muskegon, Grand Rapids and Chicago, failed.

Representatives of the five companies involved were called before the commission for a discussion of the situation by Sherman T. Handy, chairman.

Among the Detroit-Toledo lines competition has resulted in lowering the fare between these two points from $1.50 to 50 cents. At one time it was as low as 20 cents. Between Muskegon and Chicago one company has cut the fare from $10 to $6 for the round trip.

SUPERIOR AND ERIE LAKE LEVELS CONTINUE DROP

Lowering of the levels of Lakes Superior and Erie is noted in the December report of the United States Lakes Survey office in Detroit, in charge of Col. G. B. Pillsbury.

Lake Superior was 0.07 foot lower in December than in November. It was 1.43 feet higher than the low December stage of a year ago, 0.34 foot below the average stage of December of the last 10 years, and 1.45 feet below the high stages of December, 1900 and 1916.

Lake Erie was 0.07 foot lower in December than in the preceding month. It was 0.08 foot below the average stage of December of the last stage of December, 1885.

Lakes Michigan-Huron were 0.04 foot higher than in November. Lake Ontario was 0.18 foot higher than in November.

PETOSKEY TO DEDICATE STADIUM NEXT FALL

Petoskey plans to dedicate a stadium at the formal opening of Morgan Curtis field next fall. The Rotary and Kiwanis clubs have joined with the board of education in an organized effort to finance the construction of the stadium, the tentative plan for which was proposed by Homer Sly.

SEEK POSTAL BUILDING

Post Office Inspectors McSweeney and LaForge are ascertaining Marshall's needs for a federal building. The receipts of the Marshall office last year exceeded $124,000, while Charlotte, Coldwater, Hillsdale and other cities whose offices do about one-third of this amount of business have federal buildings.

MOTOR TAG REVENUE BREAKS ALL RECORDS

All records for revenue derived from the sale of license plates were shatered in 1926. A report completed by John S. Haggerty, secretary of state, shows the weight tax last year produced $15,745,859.

The 1926 receipts were more than $2,000,000 greater than in 1925, when the yield was $13,356,466.

The 2-cent gasoline tax netted more than $10,000,000 in 1926, it was estimated.

FR. RYAN HEADS NEW SEMINARY

Rev. Dennis A. Hayes, LL.D.; Mt. Morris Pastor Succeeds School Finest in U. S.

The appointment of the Rev. Fr. Daniel J. Ryan, formerly pastor of St. Mary's church, Mt. Morris, Mich., as rector of the new Sacred Heart Seminary, the largest and best equipped institution of its kind in the country, has been announced by the Rt. Rev. Michael J. Gallagher, D. D., Roman Catholic Bishop of Detroit.

Father Ryan succeeds the Rev. Fr. Dennis A. Hayes, LL. D., who was appointed pastor of St. Peter's church, Mt. Clemens, several weeks ago. He is the second rector of the new seminary to hold office since its establishment seven years ago.

The new rector was born in Jackson, and received his classical education at the University of Detroit. Later he made his philosophical and theological studies at St. Paul's Seminary, St. Paul, Minn. He was ordained in 1910 in SS. Peter and Paul Cathedral, Detroit, by Bishop Heffron, of Winona, Minn. For eight years after his ordination Father Ryan was assistant pastor at St. Stephen's church, Port Huron. In 1918 he was made pastor at Mt. Morris.

The Sacred Heart Seminary was made possible by a campaign for funds among the Catholics of the Detroit diocese in 1920, which resulted in the subscription of more than $9,000,000. More than 72,000 people donated to the fund. Its first class, numbering 10 young men, was graduated last June. This fall 400 students will enroll there for training.

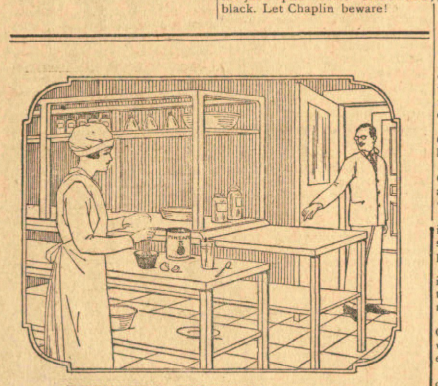
Father Ryan is well known throughout the state as an orator and an executive. It was his work at Mt. Morris which is said to have attracted Bishop Gallagher's favorable attention to him. As rector of the seminary he will head a faculty of 23 specially trained priests.

The Sorrows of Charlie Chaplin

The great clown Charlie Chaplin is finding something besides smiles and quips in his little world of stardom. True to the traditions of filmdom his romance has lasted slightly longer than it was supposed to when the marriage took place. There seems to be little of the depths of scandal which the great stars of the cinema do not indulge in. Though reputed to be worth a million dollars Chaplin is today one of the unhappiest devil-dogs who walks the streets of New York Not long since a daily paper came out with a picture of Charlie in his mourning weeds, and as he is a wonderful actor he made it look like the shades of death. His career as a screen celebrity has brought him much worldly gain, but after all is said and done will he be anything but a heap of bursted hopes and a disjointed scullion when his stage life is finished? With his old age will come diseases of the soiled life he has led, and while his coffers may be running over with gold yet his cup will be bitter as gall.

Charlie has delighted thousands of audiences all over the country with his picture antics, and as such perhaps deserves more than passing notice. The first stage of his famous career is past and the second or adolescent age takes its place. With the maturity of years the film artist takes on the character of the professional Boulevarder and prides himself on the number of divorces which he has been defendant of.

The third stage arrives a few years latter when the once all-famous actor becomes a down and outer socially—as perhaps has Evelyn Thaw. So long as Chaplin can keep up appearances and keep sober and in his right mind his services will be eagerly snapped up by film producers—but the evil day comes sooner or later when his reputation with the great picture mad world is "busted"—then the junk pile looms dread and black. Let Chaplin beware!



DIETETIC IMPORTANCE OF CANNED PINEAPPLE

WITH almost seven million cases of canned pineapple exported annually from Hawaii, an increased interest is being shown by scientists and physicians in the role which pineapple plays in dietetics.

Canned pineapple, rather than the fresh fruit, is the subject of a great deal of the scientific investigation, since the fresh pineapple which we get in this country has been picked green, and therefore contains less food value than the canned product which has been picked at maturity.

Experiments at the Hawaiian Agricultural Experiment Station have shown that during the growth of the fruit relatively small amounts of sugar are stored in it, but within the short period of normal ripening there is a rapid accumulation of sugar. Therefore pineapples gathered green do not develop a normal sugar content.

Vitamins A, B, and C, are found to a marked extent in pineapple, these investigations showed, and further experiments made at Columbia University, New York City, proved that all three of these vitamins were retained in the process of canning. Besides being a rich source of vitamins, canned pineapple contains thirty-six per cent of carbohydrate and several of the most important mineral salts. Its juice contains "bromelin," a highly digestive juice, which is especially beneficial in aiding the digestion of meats.

Physicians, realizing the value of these elements contained in pineapple, have found certain specific uses for it, notably in diptheria cases where the juices have proved very soothing to the throat. Owing to the digestive properties in pineapple, it is also used in many hospitals for invalids and convalescents. It not only aids in the digestion of other foods, but is a spur to the appetite.

Certain grades of "crushed" pineapple and a small quantity of sliced are packed especially for diabetic patients without sugar. With the exception of these few cases packed for medicinal purposes, all other pineapple contains the rich syrup made from refined pineapple juice and pure cane sugar.

Housewives who are using the largest part of the seven million cases of pineapple exported every year from Hawaii, will find in this product not only the delicious tropical tang which lends itself to a variety of uses in the meal, but valuable nutritive and digestive qualities which should give it a regular place in the daily menu.

A Code For The Smaller Community

I am one of the smaller communities of America. I am not Chicago and I am not New York. But people come here to exchange the goods of life. Some come here to sell produce and to buy clothing; some come to buy machinery; some come for education; and some come borrowing or lending money; some come foreducation; and some come for religion. Because I am a trade center, therefore I should seek to be a service center.

I will respect myself. I will not indulge in self pity because I am small.

I will develop and conserve my resources. I will not fail to organize as I should, but I will not waste my energy in useless organization.

I will not encourage factional strife of any kind, religious, social, or economic. Other communities may be able to endure factionalism but my resources are limited, and they must be conserved.

I am a thinking unit in America's great Republic, which is ruled by public opinion, and I will endeavor to make my contribution to an intelligent public opinion. I will not knowingly be ruled by ignorance nor prejudice. I will resent all attempts to fill my mind with propaganda as an insult, not to be endured at the hands of those who try it.

Because I am a community, the most important fact about me is that I have a purpose and a spirit. I will encourage all those individuals and those groups who try to keep their spirit and purpose free from evil and full of righteousness and good will.

THE CREED OF JESUS

1. I believe in the God of all love and goodness to whom we lift our hearts in trust. "Our Father."

2. I believe in the God of all power and holiness to whom we bow in reverence and awe. "Our Father in heaven."

3. I believe in the coming kingdom of God, the new world in which love and truth and righteousness shall rule. "Thy kingdom come."

4. I believe in the will of God as God's great purpose and man's highest good. "Thy will be done."

5. I believe in the loving care of God, whose power rules this world and provides for all our need. "Give us our daily bread."

6. I believe in the God of mercy in His grace and forgiveness for sinful men. "Forgive us our trespasses."

7. I believe in the law of mercy in forgiveness and good will as the rule of life between man and man. "As we forgive."

8. I believe in the redeeming God, the God whose saving help waits for every man and equals every need.

9. I believe in men as children of God, made for truth and freedom and love, for fellowship with Himself. "Our Father."

10. I believe in human brotherhood, that the tie which joins us children of one Father is greater than anything that divides, and that this brotherhood is the goal of our race and the supreme law of its life. "Our Father."—The Michigan Christian Advocate.

Mail Order Houses Are Dopey Deals

From Brother Charles Manzer's paper (the Dunkirk Indiana News) we clip the following excellent advice concerning the mail order business with which this country is thoroughly cursed:

"A dollar spent in your home town is worth two spent abroad. Most everybody is familiar with the story of the dollar that worked overtime, but here it is again; Ike owed Bill one dollar, which he paid Bill. Bill was owing Tom a dollar. So he cancelled the debt by handing the same dollar to Tom. Tom remembered that he was indebted to Jim just one hundred cents, so he handed the dollar to Jim. Jim's conscience became afflicted with the Wabash scratches and to get rid of his torment handed the dollar to Dick, from whom Jim had borrowed a dollar. This reminded Dick of an old debt to Ike, so he handed the dollar to Ike. Therefore the little old dollar cleaned up an indebtedness of five dollars and five friends were made happy. Had this dollar been sent to a mail order house it never would have got back home again."

Not only does this apply to the mail order trade but it goes equally well as regards the customers who go over to Hillsdale to buy a loaf of bread. My God! Can there be such people in this community? A certain merchant tells us this is a common practice. We should like to hold a heart to heart talk with such a person as would go to Hillsdale for most anything he could buy in North Adams. First—we would ask the bird "What would your farm be worth if North Adams were not here? If you were ten miles from a doctor, ten miles from a graded school, ten miles from a garage do you suppose your farm would sell readily or be worth what it is now? Poor fish! You little realize what you are bringing upon yourself. Take North Adams, Hanover, Addison, Litchfield, Pittsford, off the map and travel to Jackson for a box of matches, a new timer on your "Henry", a pound of meat, a few ounces of pepper. Would you enjoy this? You bet you would not. Well then Brother Josh whoever you are, let's not do that any more. North Adams needs you—and if we are not mistaken you need North Adams slightly. Come on, and let's work together for the upkeep of our own little community and let Hillsdale and Jackson go hang. We are not here to support either of them, and we are going to keep our values of farm land climbing by being near a hustling live village which supplies all the staple groceries and then some.

Prepare For Training

Young men between the ages of 17 and 24 years, in good physical condition and of good moral character are eligible to attend this year's C, M. T. camp at Camp Custer. The 30 days training does not cost any boy one cent. The government pays all expenses including railroad transportation to and from camp, food, clothing, medical and dental care and every thing a young man will need, and also furnishes trained instructors for all kinds of athletics, American citizenship, handling of a rifle and the care of it, target practice and first aid. No boy who attends these camps will be asked to enlist or sign up with any component of the Army of the United States. The training is given solely to make every boy a better, more patriotic and loyal American citizen.

Enrolling for this summer's training at Camp Custer is now on at the C. M. T. C. headquarters 438 Book Tower, Detroit, Michigan. County committee men and medical examiners are being appointed in every community in Michigan, and every boy who desires a 30 days camp experience without cost to himself or his family should write at once to the Detroit headquarters and get his application on file early.

Reserve officers all over Michigan are asked by their commanding officer to enroll at least one boy for this summer's camp. The members of the Daughters of the American Revolution and the American Legion are both interested in enrolling students for this summer's camp.

Farm Bureau Legislative News

Perhaps everyone is not acquainted with the fact that the Farm Bureau retains Stanley M. Powell as director of Legislation whose business is to sit at every session of the state legislature as a representative of the farmer just the same as the manufacturer, railroad corporations and other big business concerns are represented. Mr. Powell a well qualified man for the place keeps watch of all bills pertaining to agriculture and issues bulletins or news service which are sent to so termed minute men who are appointed by the county farm bureau. One from each township whose duties are to spread as far as possible this news service thruout the township and when bills concerning the farmer are at stake to get as far as possible the expression of the people of his township and write or wire his state representative and state senator also congressman and senator to support or oppose the bill just as other concerns are doing.

The national Farm Bureau maintains this same service with State Farm Bureau who in turn through the news service keeps the minute men informed who will do his best to spread it as far as possible. Each week during the session of the State Legislature some of these bulletins or news service will be printed in the North Adams Advocate. This news service will always be available at my home and will be glad at all times to give interviews either by phone or pesonal interviews.

This is your service and the more we make use of it the stronger we shall become in our legislative matters and let's firmly impress our representatives and senators that they represent the farmer as well as other commercial interests.

O. C. Holcomb, Minute man for Adams Township.

Farmers Week Draws Fine Crops Display

Michigan growers of field crops and horticultural products will exhibit selected samples at the shows to be held at M. S. C. during Farmers Week, January 31 to February 4. Poultry men also display their wares at an egg show which will be held at the same time.

The corn and grain show which has been held at the College in past years has been the training ground where Michigan exhibitors learned the art of preparing exhibits which would win against any competition. The lessons learned at these previous shows have been used to good advantage at the International Hay and Grain Show. Michigan farmers each year bring a large amount of prize money and a sheaf of ribbons back from the Chicago show.

The apple show will be held in the new horticultural building this year. The show will be a brilliant one, according to officials who have been checking up the entry list. A floral show, at which will be displayed the most beautiful flowers by Michigan's greenhouses, is to be a new feature of the horticultural attractions.

Prize winning entries from the state sectional potato shows will compete at the potato show. Individual classes, county classes, certified seed classes, and a class for potatoes graded by farmers will be included. The exhibits at the egg show will demonstrate the way to grade eggs for the best markets.

Famous Speakers To Talk At Farm Week

Preliminary announcement of the lineup for the big farm conference was made here this week, and reveals the fact that men who are famous leaders in different fields of work will be heard from during the week.

To Spend Half Billion on 1926 Music Lessons

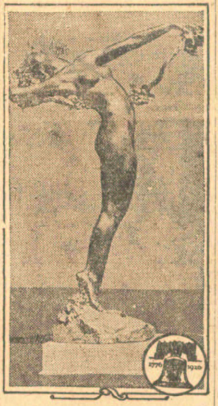
Elkhart, Ind.—Half a billion dollars will be spent by Americans for music lessons between now and next June, it is estimated by the Conn Music Center. The estimate is based on a statistical study by J. P. Blake of St. Louis.

According to Mr. Blake, there are 256,000 teachers of music who regularly practice their profession in the United States. These teachers average 20 pupils each. Allowing an average of two lessons a week for each student for the 25 weeks between now and June, means a total of 250,000,000 music-lesson hours, which at the average fee of $2 per hour, brings the income of the music teachers up to $500,000,000.

has so far readjusted our banking machinery to meet enlarged international obligations that stupendous foreign loans, such as the $100,000,000 Dawes plan credit to Germany, are concluded and the books closed after being open to public subscription only a few minutes.

"With our new world viewpoints we in America have many great things yet to do. These things are typical of the broadminded world viewpoint of American finance. It shows the vision necessary to the men who guide our business affairs today. Certainly there is an inspiration in this and the great opportunities which await us."

"The Vine"



This magnificent bronze by Harriett Frishmuth is on display in the Palace of Fine Arts at the Sesqui-Centennial International Exposition in Philadelphia where the 150th anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence is being celebrated. This is but one of the many gorgeous and beautiful things to be seen in the Fine Arts exhibit. Famous artists from all parts of the world have sent their paintings, etchings and scupltures to Philadelphia to be exhibited during the exposition, which continues until December 1.

This young woman ascends a giddy ladder every day to put finishing touches to the "Rainbow City"—the Sesqui-Centennial International Exposition, opening in Philadelphia June 1 and continuing until December 1, to celebrate the 150th anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence. She is one of an army of young artists who are making the Sesqui a colorful success.

Repairing Ocean Cables

Sometimes it is very hard to find the damaged spot in a broken cable. When the cable is known to be broken or damaged a ship sails along it and from time to time raises it and communicates over it to a station on shore. By this means it is possible to finally locate the broken place.—Exchange.

President C. C. Little of the University of Michigan will talk on Tuesday evening Feb. 1, making his first appearance before a general farm audience in the state.

Senator Royal Copeland, of New York State, farm leader and rated one of the great speakers of the day, is scheduled to address the general conference on Thursday evening, along with President Butterfield of M. S. C.

L. J. Young, Michigan's new commissioner of conservation; W. A. Cochel, editor of the Kansas City Star and formerly of the Kansas Agricultural College; H. L. Lackie, markets department, University of Wisconsin; Judge C. B. Collingwood, of Lansing; Dr. Caroline Hedger, of the Elizabeth McCormick Memorial Fund; and a long list of men prominent in state and national activities are among those listed for the Farmers Week meetings.

A feature of the week's program will be a big banquet on Wednesday evening, Feb. 2, to which all will be invited. The usual lineup of exhibits and association meetings has been scheduled.

Lengthening the hen's working day during the winter months by means of artificial light in the poultry house and thereby increasing her feed consumption with a view to greater egg production is advisable within reasonable limits, says the United States Department of Agriculture.

Chests for Children

A small chest proves a very handy article in the children's room. It is especially fine as a storage for toys and trinkets, for it is low and easy for a child to use. Then, too, it is not stationary and can be moved about the room to the most convenient spot.

Game Not Worth Candle

And, after all, of what use is this pride of appearance, for which so much is risked, so much is suffered; it cannot promote health or ease pain; it makes no increase of merit in the person; it creates envy; it hastens misfortune.—B. Franklin.

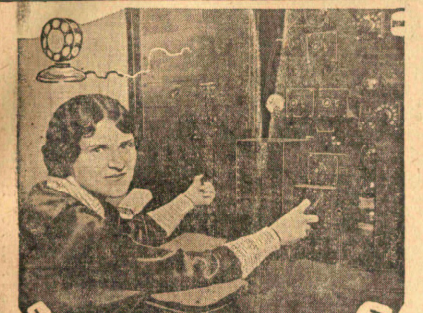
Girl Guides Radio as Band



DOROTHY AREY ROUX has sneaked in under the masculine elbow and carried off a job hitherto cornered exclusively by men. She is the only feminine radio operator in Chicago.

Miss Roux does for the radio programs of WLS, the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation station, what the man with the baton does for the orchestra, toning down the too strong voices or instruments and toning up the weak ones by a simple twist of the key on the board.

When Howard E. Campbell, chief engineer of WLS, went scouting for someone with musical training to do this intricate bit of radio work, Miss Roux won out over all other aspirants because she is a musician. She not only plays the piano, but spends Monday, her day off, teaching music.

"I never saw a radio control board until I sat down to this one," says Miss Roux. "But before I am through I expect to know everything there is to know about it even to testing the tubes and batteries. It certainly keeps a person occupied. When I am not learning brand new things about the board itself, or bolstering up some weak voice at the microphone I am out in the studio arranging the artists, showing the 'first nighters' where to stand and seeing that no one has kicked the microphone cord loose from the wall socket."

HAWAIIAN PINEAPPLE IN THE MENU

MOST of us have the habit of wanting what we want when we want it. Especially during the cold days we crave plenty of rich foods in the way of meats, roasts, curries, rich sauces, all the foods we like, but which really are generally much too rich for our digestions.

Too often we can't have some of the things we want, but there is probably no reason why we can't eat all of these delicious meats we want, if our cold weather dinners are carefully balanced.

Pineapple, for instance, has been found by science to be invaluable as an aid in digesting meats. For this reason, as well as because all of us like pineapple, our winter dinner menus should contain plenty of this healthful fruit. Fortunately, Hawaiian pineapple may be served in any course in the meal, and since it becomes a different dish when dressed in a different costume, we can readily use pineapple in two or maybe three, of our dinner courses.

Suppose we start a dinner with a South Sea Island Fruit Cup. It sounds very enchanting and proves to be a wondrous way to begin a good meal. Just remove the skins from three bananas, cut in quarters lengthwise and slice in quarter-inch slices. Arrange in cocktail or sherbet glasses. Pour ice-cold, crushed Hawaiian pineapple, the contents of a large can, over each, allowing about one-fourth cup to each serving. Garnish with a candied cherry and serve immediately.

A very attractive salad which can also be unusual, is pineapple and cream cheese salad. Use pale green heart leaves of lettuce, arranging a ring of these on individual salad plates. On each ring put a whole slice of canned Hawaiian pineapple, from a medium size can, drained and slit across with a sharp knife so that it can be easily divided by the salad fork, yet does not show the cutting until eaten. Rub a fresh cream cheese through a ricer or colander on the pineapple so that it stands up in light delicate flakes, then with a teaspoon gently put in the hole of the pineapple guava or currant jelly. Finish by sprinkling with a French dressing in which lemon juice is used instead of vinegar. The combined flavors of the dressing, pineapple tart jelly and delicate cheese are deliciously blended. Fingers of whole wheat bread and butter are delicious served with this salad.

Another salad if you wish something a little more ornate for your salad course, is Brown-Eyed Susan Salad. Place a slice of Hawaiian Pineapple, from medium can, on a lettuce leaf. Mold pimiento cheese, or cream cheese to which butter coloring and cayenne pepper have been added, into slender pointed rolls, long enough to cover pineapple from center to edge. Lay rolls on the slice of pineapple like petals of a flower. Store a ripe olive and place in center, trimming underside to make it fit. Garnish with mayonnaise.

Then, if the dessert is to be a heavy one, like plum pudding, for example, pineapple slipped in will make it not only more delicious, but much more digestible and therefore more "balanced." Hawaiian Plum Pudding is perhaps the best of this kind:

Cream one-fourth cup butter, add one cup brown sugar and one egg well beaten. Heat one-half the contents of one medium can crushed Hawaiian pineapple. Dissolve in it one teaspoon soda, one-fourth teaspoon cloves, one-fourth teaspoon cinnamon, one-fourth teaspoon nutmeg and one-half teaspoon salt. Cut into small pieces one-half cup raisins, one-fourth cup currants, one-half cup dates, one-fourth cup citron and one cup chopped nut meats. Mix with one and one-half cup flour; add alternately with pineapple to first mixture. Mix well and bake in greased muffin tins in a moderate oven (325 degrees F.) for thirty-five minutes. When cool, place in a covered tin box or jar if you are not ready to use it immediately. When ready to serve place in a steamer and steam for thirty minutes. Serve hot with hard sauce.

Oahu pineapple cake is a delicious dessert which is reminiscent of Paradise Islands where it originated. Bake a thin sheet of plain cake. Cut into six rounds the size of pineapple slices. Frost the rims with frosting made with three-fourths cup confectioner's sugar, one teaspoon orange juice and one teaspoon pineapple juice from a large can of sliced Hawaiian pineapple. Place a slice of pineapple on each cake, sprinkle with one-half cup chopped nuts. Cover the hole in pineapple ring with a delicately-browned marshmallow.

BIG BROTHERS SAVE YOUTH

Young Men Respond to Aid, Court Workers Find in Three Years Work

Judges, court workers, social service experts and police officers are unanimous in declaring that the time to do something for the criminal of today is while he is young and amenable to suggestion and good treatment. The habits of the adult are formed; but the habits of the juvenile are in a formative stage, psychologists say. A dozen other adages can be applied to the situation including "as the bough is bent, the tree will grow."

Realizing the need for an agency to care for boys and young men, thousands of whom come into the Juvenile and Recorder's courts of Detroit every year, the Diocesan Union of the Holy Name Society, in 1923, formed what is known as the "Big Brother Association" and started in to see just how many boys who had run afoul the law could be helped to re-adjust their ideas and habits of life.

Fallen-Away Catholics

One of the first things discovered was that the great majority of the lads who came into court charged with everything from truancy to robbery armed, had fallen away from their church and had long since ceased to attend either church or school. Bad companions, unhealthy home environment, lack of parental discipline, due to the death of one parent or divorce; these were the causes behind the crimes, the investigators found.

Confining their attention to those boys who had declared themselves to be Catholics, since the Rev. Edward L. Hughes, of the Detroit Council of Churches, was already on the ground caring for Protestant youths, the Big Brothers concerned themselves with boys who were placed on probation and those who received sentences to reformatories.

In the case of boys placed on probation, the case of each boy was carefully investigated, an analysis of his situation made and this data, together with a recommendation was turned over to the Big Brothers in the parish where the boy lived. If bad companionship was at the root of the boy's trouble an effort was made by the parish worker to substitute a better atmosphere by inviting the lad to various parochial meetings and athletic events.

Work Obtained

In all cases the boys were encouraged to resume their church affiliations and to attend services regularly. If they were obliged to work, an effort was made to obtain employment for them in circumstances where they would be exposed to temptation as little as possible. This same plan was applied to boys who had been sentenced to reformatories upon their release from the various institutions.

Naturally a boy who was accustomed to hanging around poolrooms and consorting with "sheik" bandits showed an improvement upon becoming a member of a parochial basketball or bowling team. The fact that he had to make a weekly report to the probation officer as to his manner of living helped to remind him that he had a definite duty to perform and to understand that the Big Brothers were endeavoring to aid him in the performance of this duty.

From the first, the work of the Big Brothers has met with success. Writing of it, Judge Harry B. Keidan declared: "That through their (the Big Brothers) efforts scores of young men have been saved from prison cells . . . the Holy Name Society is doing a piece of constructive work, and to abandon it would be, in my judgment, a backward step and a serious mistake."

High Praise

Other judges in both the Recorder's court and the Juvenile court have similarly endorsed the work of the Big Brothers while probation workers and police officials are equally enthusiastic about the results obtained by the workers.

Through the efforts of the Big Brothers, Mass is now said regularly and frequently in all of the prisons and jails in the vicinity of Detroit and Catholic prisoners in these institutions are afforded ample opportunity to go to Confession and Holy Communion. In almost every case, it is found that when the wrong-doer has resumed his church affiliations he takes a new outlook on life and is ready to start out again on a new mode of living.

Home Needed

The Big Brothers, basing their opinions on what they have discovered about the youthful offender during the three years of their existence, say that many boys would be better off for a term of confinement—if the proper place for confinement existed. They stress the need of a home for boys where the lads could be protected against the bad influences which surround their home lives rather than punished. Such a home does not exist at present in Detroit, but plans for the establishment of one have been under way for some time.

At the present time the Big Brothers, whose work has been recognized by the Detroit Community Fund which contributes to its support, is in charge of Charles E. Shea, executive secretary, with Ralph K. Doherty as the field worker.

Rack to Hold Utensils

A rack that will hold the milk cans, pails, and strainers where they will be exposed to the sun is a good thing. We put ours on the south side of the room when they are washed, says a writer. It is made of two-by-fours set so that the cans are upside down and lean toward the building. The sun's rays make the best germicide known. If cans and pails are carelessly washed and put right side up in the room the germs will multiply with almost unbelievable rapidity.

MATE ON LAKES PIRATE SHIP DIES

Capt. David H. Ross, one-time first mate of the only private ship that ever swept the Great Lakes, who 62 years ago fled from Detroit with a price on his head is dead.

With the death of Captain Ross, passed the only living man in North America who never had been hunted as a pirate, escaped, later arrested, then pardoned, and who returned to visit the scenes he once helped to terrify.

David Ross' adventures began when he was 18, when the Civil War broke out. He was a cadet in the Macon Guards, the pride of Georgia.

For nine months in 1864, Sergeant Ross was a prisoner in the military stockade on Rock Island. One bleak, rainy day he escaped in a Quaker ambulance. He wore a Union uniform and was wrapped in a blanket and lifted into the amublance as though he were ill.

With the help of a southern woman across the river, he made his way to Detroit and across to Windsor in Canada. There he arrived just in time to take part in one of the most dramatic incidents of the Civil War—just in time to become a pirate and first mate of the only corsair that ever sailed the Great Lakes.

FORD SOON TO BUILD VEHICLE MUSEUM ON BIRTHPLACE SITE

Henry Ford has taken definite steps for erection of the new proposed Ford Industrial Museum on the site of his birthplace at Fordson.

Mayor Joseph M. Karmann of Fordson, who consulted with Ford said work on the museum, which will occupy a 40-acre site, will start this spring.

The museum will house every type of vehicle, including the plane Commander Richard Byrd flew over the North Pole, an assortment of brick making devices and a collection of saw mills.

UPHOLD DETROIT'S RIGHT TO FILL RIVER FOR AIRPORT

Detroit can legally obtain possession of the Middleground, between Belle Isle and the mainland, for airport purposes by getting permission of State and Federal governments, Charles P. O'Neil, corporation counsel, said in an opinion.

Mr. O'Neil at the same time announced that, in accordance with the instructions of the council, he will take immediate steps to acquire possession of the territory for the city. This will be done, he said, first by obtaining the consent of the state to waive its rights to the Middleground in the city's favor, and then by getting an order from the War Department permitting the submerged land to be reclaimed.

225 YEAR'S TOLL OF BANDITS' GUNS IN STATE METROPOLIS

The pistols of Detroit gunmen took the lives of 225 citizens during 1926, according to the report of Lieut. Fred Frahm, head of the homicide squad.

Against the gunmen's toll, police and citizens accounted for 99, of which police killed 43. In the death toll there are listed eight policemen killed in the performance of duty.

The report shows that 82 per cent of the murders were solved, against 72 per cent solved in 1925 when there were 153 murders.

BOY KILLS WILDCAT NEAR ALPENA WITH 22 RIFLE

Otto Wisner, 18 years old, of Alpena, went rabbit hunting a few days ago with a 22 calibre rifle. He saw a large animal bounding over the snow and stopped it with a single shot. Wisner was surprised to learn that he had killed a 25-pound wildcat.

DOWNTOWN SUBWAY DIPS IN DETROIT ARE OPPOSED

Reiterating its belief that Detroit is ready and able to finance a complete rapid transit system, the Rapid Transit Commission opposes a system of downtown subway dips as unwise and likely to set a bad precedent for the financing and construction of the remainder of a complete system.

The commission says it is highly "desirable from the standpoint of the best interests of the city as a whole to begin with the full four lines recommended, to spread the benefits of rapid transit over all four quarters of the city as nearly uniformly as possible. In this way all are treated alike and no one section obtains a great advantage over the others."

POST HOLE REVEALS GYPSUM AND TOWN IS BUILT OVER NIGHT

Emery Junction, Mich., a settlement on the Detroit & Mackinaw Railroad, 49 miles north of Bay City, has blossomed out as National City, Mich., all because of the finding of extensive gypsum deposits in the vicinity and the erection by the National Gypsum Co. of a plant that will place the product on the market.

Already 180 men are at work on a building that is to be 750 feet long and 75 feet wide. This, when it is completed, will be the largest wall board plant in the world. There are to be three plaster mills and five calcining kettles. The company controls 400 acres of land where the average thickness of the gypsum deposit is said to be 25 feet.

A farmer digging fence holes in Sherman Township, Iosco County, is responsible for the metamorphosis of the little community. He communicated his discovery to H. N. Butler, president of the Chamber of Commerce at East Tawas, Mich., and Mr. Butler, interested eastern capital. He has been made Michigan representative of the company whose activities are making a town out of a crossroads hamlet.

RICH AND POOR IN FIGHT FOR CHILD

Tiny 5-year-old Margaret Ann Luce, of Highland Park, is the center of a strange legal battle which opened in New York. Will she be permitted to remain in New York with her wealthy guardian to become his heiress eventually, or will she be given into the custody of her father and come to Detroit to grow up under the influence of a middle class home?

This is the issue involved in the suit which comes up for hearing in a few days before Supreme Court Justice James J. Dunne, of Brooklyn.

The child's father is Ernest Luce, 28, automobile plant mechanic, living at Highland Park.

The guardian is John McCormack, rich lawyer and close friend of John Hylan, former New York mayor, and other notables. Little Margaret Ann is now living with McCormack, who looks on her as his own, in his 14-room Brooklyn mansion, where she has three servants.

Margaret's mother, who died last April, was formerly a ward of McCormack's wife.

95 BREEDERS IN STATE GO IN FOR RABBIT FARMS

The Federal Bureau of Biological Survey reports that Michigan possesses 95 breeders of rabbits for meat and fur purposes. The breeds include American Blues, Blue Beverens, White Beverens, Flemish Giants, Checkered Giants, New Zealand Reds and Whites and French Silvers. Twenty-five of these miniature fur farms are within a few miles of Detroit's City Hall.

CORRESPONDENCE COURSES OPEN AT EAST LANSING

Details of the new correspondence courses in sociology and agriculture economics, which Michigan State college offers for the first time were announced officially by John D. Willard, director of continuing education.

According to present arrangements a definite limit on the number of college credits secured by "mail courses" will be imposed. Students will be allowed no more than 48 academic credits toward a bachelor's degree thru correspondence study.

NUMBER OF FARMS IN UPPER PENINSULA GAIN

The number of farms in the Upper Peninsual has increased approximately 20 per cent in the last five years, United States Government figures reveal. Alger, Gogebic, Iron, Keweenaw, Mackinac, Marquette, Ontonagon and Schoolcraft counties showed more than a 20 per cent increase. This record is regarded very good in view of the condition of many farms.

BASS HATCHERY NEAR READY IN NORTH SECTION

This year will witness the establishment of the Upper Peninsula's first extensive bass hatchery. It is expected that fingerling production will begin with the June spawning season.

OBSERVE 50 YEARS WED IN HOUSE OF HONEYMOON

Married 50 years and never moved, that is the record of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Harper, farmers, living near Shaftsburg. They have just celebrated their golden wedding anniversary.

Must Learn to Play Seriously

Dick Cox, young outfielder who went to the Brooklyn Dodgers from the Pacific Coast League two years ago and broke into the game as a regular immediately, has been sent to Los Angeles as part payment for Statz, who'll play center next year. Cox could not take the game seriously, Manager Robinson decided.

CONSERVATISM IS CROP WARNING OF U S. TO FARMERS

General conservatism as to crop acreage this year is the advice broadcast to farmers by the department of agriculture.

"The events of 1926 convey a clear warning for the cotton belt and reasonable assurance to the livestock producers," the department said.

"Considering the country as a whole 1926 seems to have been registered in the minds of a majority of farmers as a disappointing year. The rise in price of farm products in 1924, which was fairly sustained during 1925, had aroused still further hopes for 1926, but the fruit prices this fall reduced the purchasing power of extensive regions and brought the season to a rather depressing close.

"Many producers of winter wheat, potatoes and certain livestock products did well, however."

CLOSED FOX SQUIRREL SEASON SEEN IN MOVE

Inu line with the general movement to give depleting wild animals a chance to come back, is the announcement of the state conservation department that a closed season on for squirrels may be ordered.

The open season on the animal now runs with the bird season, the bag limit is five in one day and 15 for the season. Even with this limit, in addition to the fact squirrel hunters are few in number, sportsmen report the animal's population is on the gradual decline.

SPARTA MAN, 77 IS CHAMP WIELDER OF CORN KNIFE

When it comes to wielding a wicked corn knife, N. A. Vinton, 77-year-old farmer of Sparta just about holds the record for the State of Michigan, it is believed.

In 17 days of nine hours each last fall he cut and shocked 32 acres of corn. There were 1,502 large shocks on the field when he finished.

Vinton prefers the old-fashioned method of cutting. He ties four hills together to get a start and works without a "wooden horse."

$13,813 STATE'S SHARE FROM U. S. FOR FORESTS

Michigan will receive $13,813 from the $7,500,000 highway fund for national forests which Congress has appropriated as a part of the federal aid road act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, it was announced by the forestry service in Washington.

MICHIGAN BOY IS WILL FIGHT FIGURE

Earl Lewis, 11, of Greenville, will be the central figure in the contest over the estate of Mrs. Robert H. Ingersoll, wife of the former dollar watchmaker, it was indicated. Mrs. Ingersoll committed suicide in New York recently after seriously wounding wallace Probasco.

Lewis is the son of Mrs. John B. Lewis, of Greenville. His mother was formerly Mrs. Arthur H. Liberty, and her divorced husband, now in St. Johnsbury, Vt., is planning to investigate the adoption of his son by Mrs. Lewis and her present husband, former Montcalm county prosecutor. Mrs. Lewis divorced Liberty in 1917. Then she went under her maiden name, Nolan, and before her marriage to Lewis she cared for Mrs. Ingersoll.

The Ingersoll will leaves the boy $100,000 but attorneys say the will was so written that he will not have the use of the money until he is 35. Liberty has sent an attorney to investigate the formal adoption of the boy by his mother and Lewis following their marriage.

THUMB LAND VALUES SHOW BIG GAIN SINCE 1910

The report of the United States bureau of the census shows that the Thumb farm values have increased materially during the period from 1910 to 1925. Of the four counties in this section, Huron leads with an increase of 60 per cent; Lapeer comes next with an increase of 52 per cent; Sanilac is third with 49 per cent, and Tuscola fourth with 36 per cent.

Tuscola leads the Thumb in value of farm crops, or did in 1924, with a round total of just under $5,000,000. Sanilac leads in livestock and production of milk, however, with $4,382,490, although Huron, Tuscola and Lapeer are not so very far behind.

AXE FOR YULE TREE HELD NOT VANDAL

Around this time of the year when the vacant lots of the city are piled high with the broken, dead limbs of discarded Christmas trees after their tinseled dress had gladdened the hearts of youngsters, those who are interested in the forestry and wild life phase of conservation are pressed with mixed emotions.

They think of this annual harvest of immature conifer trees.

Sentiment is about evenly divided.

There are those who hold firmly to the belief that the Christmas tree custom involves a great and unnecessary waste. They point to the age of the average four or five-foot balsm-fir or white spruce as the case may be and convince one that each represents a growth of from eight to 15 years. In cutting it down we have destroyed potential saw logs, the value of which in years to come will far offset any satisfaction in its use for Christmas purposes. It is also pointed out that it is quite possible that many of the trees were harvested from lands fighting to prevent soil erosion and infertility.

In our own state trees most used are the balsam-fir or white spruce. In some localities white cedar, jack pine and small Norway, or white pines are used. It is seldom that these trees are found in upland game covers, usually being confined to the swamps or lowlands. There is no doubt to their value as protective covering for many species of wild life. This holds true particularly in winter when shelter from storms and cutting winds is essential.

The general impression among those familiar with the habitat of these trees is that there is no great reason for alarm in their cutting for Christmas purposes provided it is done sensibly. No one advocates the stripping of areas nor do they condone the stealing of trees from state or private forests. But if they are harvested from lands where thinning is practicable it is of a direct benefit to the remaining stand of timber.

PLEA FOR BABBITS AND FAIR SPORT IS MADE BY LINDEN MAN

Greley Everitt of Linden, pleads for more sportsmanship in hunting cottontails.

"It is doubtful is there is another bit of game that furnishes more sport for the general run of hunters than our rabbit," says Mr. Everitt. "Much of the time the hunter pursuing this game arms himself with a scatter gun that covers so much territory the game hasn't any more chance than a mud turtle crossing Wider Woodward avenue on a Sunday. Fair sportsmen get all the sport they want out of using the .22 rifle with its single short and certainly develop into better shots. If more gunners would take to this there would be plenty of rabbits to keep us all in sport during the open season."

$18,000 STRAWBERRIES CROP FROM 25 ACRES

F. J. Thar, Benton Harbor fruit grower is believed to have received the largest return from his strawberry plantation this season of any farmer in Michigan, and possibly in the middlewest.

From 25 acres of strawberries, Mr. Thar sold $18,000 worth of the fruit.

HAWAII IS ON STATE SWIMMING TEAM THIS YEAR

Probably the most colorful performer on Coach Sterry Brown's swimming team at Michigan State this winter is Joe Katsunuma, a native Hiawaiian, who bids fair to uphold the natatorial traditions of his country by smashing several state tank records.

Katsunuma swims the free style events, in which he is considerably better than average. Katsunuma is also a base ball player, and is the leading candidate for the job as catcher on State's team.

SNOWSHOE MAKER OLD SCHOOL ARTIST

In the northern peninsula where nature refuses to retreat before the advances of civilization, lives an artisan of the old school, who is successfull holding him own. He is D. H. Pratt of Grand Marais, a picturesque little village in Alger county, located near the sand dunes mentioned in Longfellow's "Hiawatha."

Mr. Pratt specializes in the manufacture of snow shoes, which is the most essential outdoor article in the upper peninsula. That he is a master craftsman is the opinion of hundreds of men and women of the north woods, who have found his products excelling any others. A visit to his shop over in Grand Marais shows old time workmanship at its best.

Like the ancient craftsman, Mr. Pratt makes everything that comprises his famous show shoes, except the rivets, which he procures from nearby stores. The ash, which gives the hoop of his shoes their durability and beauty, is secured by Mr. Pratt, who spends hours at a time searching in the neighboring forests for the proper wood. The fleshing of the hides, which are purchased from trappers, and the careful assembling of the parts are all done by the artisan.

CAMPUS AUTO NOW BELEIVED CURBED

When Harold Teen of the University of Michigan and his chosen gang board Leaping Lena for an evening of "innocent merriment," certain citizens of Ann Arbor and particularly the residents along State street restrain with difficulty an impulse to crawl into a convenient hole and pull the hole in after them.

At least that was the situation prior to the opening of the present school year. Now, however, Harold has been thoroughly questionnaired, subjected to a searching sociological investigation, registered, restricted, banned and barred. His impulses have been labeled, studied and properly indexed.

The pernicious effort of the automobile on student life has long been a subject for debate.

The report, "The Automobile on the Michigan Campus," indicates a fair knowledge of what activities Harold, but what made Leaping Lena go remains as great a mystery as ever.

University automobiles throughout the country have long recognized the fact that the automobile is having a decided effect on student life. It was believed that the younger generation's manner of burning the midnight oil was scarcely conducive to high classroom standings and that the sweet voice of Athena, Goddess of Wisdom, was too often drowned out by the opened muffler, the lugubrious "moo horn" or the cacophonous "hort pipe."

Something more than a year ago a letter was displayed by the University to student homes asking that parents forbid the use of automobiles during the school year. There was no response.

Before the present term opened, University authorities resolved to take more direct action. The situation was becoming rapidly worse. Besides counteracting any existing inclination for studious pursuits, the student automobile, it was felt, involved "certain moral risks" which greatly complicated the satisfactory administration of more than 10,000 young men and young women.

A ruling was made that no freshman or sophomore might own or operate an automobile except with special permission, that no one might own or operate an uatomobile unless a satisfactory class standing was maintained and that all student cars must be registered with the Dean of Students.

SEES PROPERTY SEIGURE IN OLD DETROIT CHARTER

Asserting the present Detroit Charter provisions regarding tax titles virtually give private investors the privilege of confiscating property, Guy L. Ingalls, city treasurer announced he would ask the Council to enact new legislation.

Unless city taxes are paid within a year, investors may pay them and thus obtain tax titles, under the system now in effect. The owner can redeem his property within two years by paying the taxes and a 10 per cent penalty, both of which are turned over to the holder of the tax title. If no settlement is made within two years the owner must pay the tax title buyer twice the amount of the taxes, or the city must give the tax title buyer a 99-year lease on the property.

$10 PAID ON COUNTY DEBT 20 YEARS OLD FOR ITS COURTHOUSE

Shiawassee County has made a start toward paying a debt of $60,000 which has hung over her courthouse since it was erected more than 20 years ago. The payment is only $10, but it is a start.

The money was a donation from William R. Dean of Vernon, who served four years as county treasurer, retiring four years ago.

Dean declares, in a letter accompanying the donation, that although the courts have held the debt illegal, he is convinced that it is a moral obligation and that he wants to pay his honest share.

"I figure," Dean wrote, "that my share of the total debt is about $10. I have been ridiculed for this position, but I am free, white and 21, work for my money and can spend it as I please."

The debt was created when the court house was built, and the question of its legality was carried to the United States Supreme court, which held that it was illegal.

The people had voted a bond issue of $75,000 to finance the construction of the court house. When it was under way, however, it was found that another $60,000 would be necessary to complete the building. The board of supervisors, without a vote of the people, borrowed the money from various persons. The lenders included Hugh McCurdy, former circuit judge, and the only Michigan man who ever became grand commander of the grand encampment, Knights Templar of the United States; his son, John T. McCurdy, and his grandson, Hugh McCurdy Eaton.

With the building finished, the board of supervisors took steps to repay those who had loaned the money, only to find that they had exceeded their authority.

MUCK LAND PROVES 'MINT' FOR FARMER

Nearly everyone has grown to associate the word "mint" with money, and it may have been this thought that led Anthony Lienhart, Ingham county farmer, to do his own "minting," with the result that he has cleared an $18,000 indebtedness on his holdings and has a substantial bank balance to his credit.

Lienhart, who knew adversity in Germany when he was a boy, obtained a small acreage in the Portage river valley, a mile and a half northeast of Bunkerhill in Ingham county. He went in debt $6000 on the place, and this, coupled with the fact that he was the father of 10 children made his prospects for the future dim. Then his wife, who had worked with him many years, died. About the same time came the announcement of a drainage plan for which Lienhart's assessment was $12,000.

Lienhart began to notice that peppermint thrived on the muck land left in huge acreages after the waters receded. He had heard that peppermint oil was in general demand and that a fair price was obtained by growers. Aided by two of his young but husky sons he cleared several acres of the land and set out the light green plants in profusion. His realization was more than he expected, so he increased his acreages. Today he owns 510 acres of this soil, free of all financial encumbrances and he put $25,000 into improvements on his holdings the last year.

NAVY AIR COURSE AT ANN ARBOR NOW PART OF CURRICULUM

Detailed instruction in naval aviation as a regular part of the University of Michigan curriculum was approved by members of the board of regents assembled at Ann Arbor.

The regents authorized an elaborate programme of courses which will be given by faculty members of the department of aeronautical engineering, assisted by Lieut. L. K. Marshall of the United States Naval Reserve.

Courses approved include structure, rigging, instrument, aerology, theory of flight, aviation engines, sea navigation, aviation indoctrination, air craft communications, aerial navigation, practical flying, regulations, and scouting.

$380 SURPRISE BILL FOR CARE OF HORSE SAYS JULIETTE'S OWNER

Frank E. Wells, of Detroit, does not propose to pay a $380 bill for the maintenance of Julietta of Broadview at an exclusive academy. Mr. Wells presumed Julietta had been enjoying the quiet life of a Wayne County farm until he received a bill for her board and shoes at an aristocratic school patronized by the millionaire colony.

Julietta is a baby mare valued at $1,200. On Nov. 17, 1925, Wells entered into a contract with John B. Whitely to cinderize a subdivision owned by the latter on the Six-Mile road. Included in the agreement was a provision that Whitely would board Julietta at his farm at $20 a month in the winter and half that in the summer.

TIMBER WOLF IS TAKEN CAPTIVE IN RODEO STYLE

Capturing timber wolves in rodeo fashion is the boast of Edward Gilstrom, Ontonagon county trapper, whose feats are attested by the occasional display of a wolf he has taken alive.

The spectacle of a 60-pound wolf reposing in the arms of its captor was paraded to the gaze of Houghton citizens recently by Gilstrom, who stroked the head of the animal as if it were a kitten. The docility of the young wolf, however, was due to the fact that Gilstrom had its mouth and feet securely bound with haywire.

GIRLS ARTISIANS BOYS NOW COOK

Detroit's next generation of adults will be an astonishing group. The men, for one thing, actually will be able to sew buttons on their vests. Not content with this curious pastime, they also will know how to help their wives, with the fall canning and won't have to be told this and that about the technique of the operation, either. And the man of the house will be able to superintend the cooking and buying of household supplies.

That's only half of it. For the women may set up workshop in their basements and with hammer, saw and plane construct kitchen tables and bird houses and other home-made ornaments that today must await man's mood and convenience.

On Saturday afternoons mother and father may join efforts in the weaving of rush-bottom chairs. And—but you can see nearly anything is likely to happen in such a queer state of affairs.

And yet it won't be queer at all, but simply a natural condition in which men and women express themselves in ways that ancient custom has denied them, according to teachers of general arts classes in the Detroit public schools, who accept the entire responsibility for this coming revolution.

Under the old scheme of things, you know, boys took courses in natural training, while girls were taught the rudiments of cooking and sewing. But the general arts course, which is becoming a regular part of the elementary school curriculum has wrought a marked change. Both boys and girls now learn sewing, cooking, woodworking and weaving.

TITLE CLAIMED BY 9 TWINS IN TOWN

New Haven, a village of 700 people 30 miles from Detroit, claims the distinction of having more twins than any other town its size in the country.

Its nine pairs range from 3 to 18 years, and seven are attending the village school.

Walter B. Phelps, superintendent of the school and father of the youngest pair, challenges any other town in the world to show so many twins.

The oldest twins are Harry and Howard Dryer, 18-year-old sons of Charles Dryer. They are both in the senior class. Helene and Eveline Shultz are attractive 16-year-olds, and it is almost impossible to identify them apart. Gretah and Gretchen Wilson, 12, are as much alike as their names. The Duncan twins, Marcan and Melvin, do not look exactly alike and one goes to school in New Haven, the other in Detroit.

The Erdman twins, Alvin and Agnes, are a year younger than the Duncan twins, but they are a boy and a girl.

Frank Madous' twins, Florence and Franz, are in the fourth grade also and they are nine. Mary and Theresa Kuzdzal are 11 and both are in the fifth grade. Mr. Phelps' twins, Ardies and Keith, won't be ready for school for two years yet.

None of the families with twins are even remotely related. Eight pairs were born in the village.

The study of the twins brings out many interesting facts. Two twins who may appear identical in every way may rank very differently as students. One may get high marks and the other may receive very low marks.

FOREST PROTECTION PLANS BEING FORMED BY PROF. L. J. YOUNG

Sweeping changes in the conservation department of the state that will bring protection and development of Michigan's forests are being planned by Professor Leigh J. Young, former head of the forestry department of the University of Michigan, and recently appointed state conservation director.

Protection of the state forests against fire, a rapid increase in the number of forests through planting and development of state-owned lands and the introduction of a method of scientific research in forestry that will parallel the past work in this line upon game and fish were the three points stressed by Professor Young.

ANOTHER JUDGE ASKED FOR OAKLAND COURTS

Oakland County supervisors adopted a resolution to be sent to the Michigan Legislature asking passage of an enabling act that would give the county a third Crcuit Judge. Attention was called to the fact that cases are being filed faster than the two judges can dispose of them.

DEAN OF BUTCHERS RECALLS DETROIT AS UNBROKEN PRAIRIE

The days of Detroit's youth—when the river teemed with lumber schooners, farmers cried their wares in the public market in Cadillac Square, and the district west of what is now Twelfth stret was an unbroken prairie —are vividly recalled by George H. Russell, 79 years old.

Mr. Russell was characterized as the "dean of American packing house men" at the Meat Packers' Institute held in Chicago. He was said at that time to be the oldest packing house employe in the United States in point of service, having worked continuously for 63 years. He began with the John Biggly market at the foot of Twenty-first strre when 15 years old. For 46 years he has been with the Hammond-Standish company, as butcher, meat inspector, and superintendent of the smoke house.

"Seventy-seven years ago, when my father moved the family to Detroit from St. Clair," Mr. Russell relates, "we settled on a farm located where Eighteenth street runs now, between Porter and Baker. Our house was the first built west of Twelfth street and there was nothing but fields of rank weeds on all sides."

NAMING STREET CARS FOR SCHOOLS SPURS RIVALRY

Charles S. Kressler, president and general manager of the Saginaw Traction Company, started something when he painted the names of two Saginaw high schools on the street cars especially selected for the distinction. At a recent meeting of the street railway executives' national organization he had to tell all about his interesting experiments in building up local good will with a paint brush. So mpressed was an Iowa street railway manager that he immediately called his home town on long distance telephone from New York City and ordered that the experiment be tried on a western clientele.

"I got the idea at a foot ball game," explains Mr. Kressler. "They were yelling for their teams and I thought, 'Why can't a stret railway that is in need of all the good will it can get turn some of this tremendous enthusiasm to its own account?'"

STORK LEADS REAPER BY EIGHT IN IONIA COUNTY

Ionia county gained only eight persons as a result of births and deaths in the county, figures for 1926 show. There were 416 births and 408 persons died during the year. In 1925 there were 185 more births than deaths and in 1924 the birth record was 81 greater than the death record.

Marriages in the county also fell off during the last year, when 274 licenses were issued, according to the annual report of County Clerk William H. Dilley. This is a decrease of 44 from 1925, 62 from 1924 and 72 from 1923.

While marriages decreased, divorces were on the increase. The report shows 130 divorce bills filed, as compared with 111 in 1925 and 118 in 1924.

PROFIT AND THRILLS COMBINED IN HUNT FOR LIVING SKUNKS

Skunk hunting is a sport that is full of thrills and sometimes unpleasant consequences. It is profitable to the trapper, gives him a great measure of excitement and is easily taken up, for the only equipment needed is a burlap bag and a rabbit proof dog. The game is to capture the skunk alive.

Of nocturnal habits, the skunk sallies forth from its warm den under the cover of darkness, making its way to the farmer's hen coop or whatever destination it has in mind. The purpose of the dog is to track the skunk and catch it far away from its den. Unable to escape from its swifter pursuer, the skunk stands at bay, turning to face the dog as the latter circles about. From the racket that ensues, the hunter knows that his quarry has been located and he comes running up with the burlap bag.

Trapping the skunk alive calls for a great amount of finesse. The hunter must contrive to throw the bag over the skunk while the dog occupies the greater share of the little animal's attention.

OLD TREE USED BY BEN FOR BEACON

Now that "King" Benjamin Purnell of the House of David again has attained notoriety, the primeval Lone Pine of Aral, deserted lumber village north of Honor on the Lake Michigan shore, has taken an added interest to residents and visitors in this section.

The old landmark and ships' beacon has nothing to do with King Ben's fall, nor was it responsible for the other human dramas enacted under its canopy of needles, but it bears the marks of those times and thereby discloses its secrets to hundreds of tourists who annually visit it, since the increase in West Michigan resort activities.

The House of David colony "logged" two large cedar swamps in the vicinity of Aral from 1903 to 1906, operating boats from the Aral pier to haul their products to the world's markets. The peculiar shelves on the trunk of the great pine tree and facing the lake were put there by the House of David workers. The larger bottom one was occupied by a lookout daytimes and it is said that even King Ben on the few occasions when he visited his camp became anxious over the arrival of the colony's boats and climbed the rope ladder to scan Lake Michigan's waters. The shelf above supported a beacon light at night to guide the same boats to dock.

SPORTSMEN WIN FIGHT TO BLOCK DAMMING RIVER

Information indicates that the Per Marquette Development Co. has abandoned its plan to dam the Pere Marquette River for power purposes, a move fought for months by sportsmen. State refusal to sell two tracts of land on the river is said to have caused the decision.

It marks the second victory sportsmen have won in connection with the Pere Marquette River, one of the favorite trout streams of Michigan, within the last two weeks.

CITY REFUSES SALE OF DOG POUND FOR $15

The municipal dog pound of Traverse City may not be worth more than $15, and although it is not being used now, it is not for sale.

The city commission, which received an offer of three crisp, new $5 bills for the dilapidated building, has decided not to dispose of the property. Some day, the commission figures, the city may have a poundmaster who does not possess a barn or kennel and the crumbling guard house may come in handy.

BANDS TAB DATA ON STATE'S BIRDS

How fast do birds travel in their migrations? Does one pair remain mated for more than a season, and which bird, if not both, returns to the old nesting place the next year? How long do birds live?

These and many other problems eventually will be solved through activities of numerous bird banding societies scattered through the country, operating under the United State Biological survey. Interesting, and undoubtedly unique data has been obtained by many of the bird catchers, among them Prof. J. W. Stack of the Michigan State college zoology department, secretary of the Inland association.

In the three years that Prof. Stack has been trapping birds at the college, more than 2,000, representing 42 species, have been banded. Three traps, set rather close together, are located in the botanical gardens and 12 in the forest nursery. Professor Stack visits each three times a day during migration season.

Among other bird banders of note in Michigan are: M. J. Magee, Sault Ste. Marie, who has the record in the state and ranks among the highest in the country in number of birds banded. He has also conducted investigations in purple finches; William B. Purdy, Milford, whose interest is in Common Terns; Walter Hastings of South Lyons, with a record of 1,585 birds, 200 of which were herring gulls; C. W. Bradt of State college, and three Wing brothers of Jackson, who have conclusive proof of a cock-pheasant killing a quail, having arrived on the scene of the act.

MICHIGAN PRISON LARGEST IN U. S.

The crook from Detroit—or any other Michigan city eventually meets the inevitable fate of the smartest crook. He "fades out of the picture" for a few years.

"Fading out of the picture" is the way in which the nuderworld refers to periodic absences of its first citizens. In plain yords, they are serving time in one of the state prisons. Although the segregating of characters dangerous to community welfare is the first interest of the public, few in Michigan are posted on the steps now being taken by the state to maintain its end of the endless battle on crime. How many know, for instance, that the first units of what is to be the largest prison in the United States, if not the world, are nearing completion on the big prison farm three miles north of Jackson? Soon crooks who "fade from the picture" will step into a $7,000,000 "frame" that is being built for them. The new prison will not be completed for two years.

When Michigan, in its territorial days, set out to build its "city outside of Jackson of society," a 14-acre site out side of Jackson was enclosed with a high wall. There were cell blocks in which the cells were three and one-half feet wide, with a door through which the prisoner slipped sideways. At the time, however, the place stood high in the regard of students of prison reform.

Some years ago the normal capacity of the old State Prison was filled. Jackson had grown until the institution was close to the heart of the city. Plans for a new building were talked long before work actually was begun. Now construction has been under way for many months, but it was not until prison experts from other states began to flock in to look over the project that Michigan began to realize the magnitude of what it had undertaken. The big institution of Joliet, Ill., which long held the center of the stage for folks interested in that sort of thing, has faded into a position second to that held by Michigan.

CONVICTED OF BEGGING, HAS $7,000 IN BANK

An aged, stoop-shouldered man who six weeks ago was sentenced to serve 30 days in the etroit House of Correction following his conviction in the Recorder's Court on a charge of begging, had at least $7,600 on deposit in a bank at the time, it was disclosed at the hearing of a petition for a guardian.

The man, 70 years old, is Charles Peter Engdahl.

The Mexican War Cloud

Every time the Nation indulges in a few little differences with any other country there awake a million yellow eyed yappers all over the land who harp constantly and garruliously on the possibilities of war They dont know anything about it but they must follow tradition and warn the masses, kind of Paul Revere-like, don't you know!

On this occasion they did not expect it so soon—therefore were not well prepared with red mouth propaganda. As a matter of fact at different times during the past thirty years the United States of America has looked with scowls upon the doings of our "Greaser" brother across the line and if appearances counted for anything, said greaser has come within about one inch of having his jacket tanned many times. The American government is much too easy to use a corrective measure with the mischievous bad boy across the Rio Grande. So long as he keeps in his own play house which geographical location makes absolutely necessary, we have little time to bother, but when he gets noisy, saucy and intoxicated with mescal not a hundred miles from our Canal Zone, perhaps Uncle Samuel will lay off his own affairs just long enough to soundly trounce the tattered rascal.

That would be a correction in the purest sense of the word—and not a great war, as most of the yellow journals would have you think The unfortunate part of the whole matter is the Catholic upheaval as pre-fomented by President Calles bringing his country as well as ourselves face to face with a religious revolution, against our wishes and antagonistic to the great common masses in Mexico. While Mexico is strictly a Catholic country in all the sordid ignorance and superstition that goes with it—we are reminded that Calles has made it so hot for the "Fawthers" they vimosed across the border into America. President Coolidge should pass the joke and the boot right along to Canada or some other place—keep them moving at any rate.

Undoubtedly Calles has come to realize that for centuries the awful results of Catholic control have brought Mexico to the lowest ebb, and seeks to rid the country of a plague, even at the expense of establishing Sovietism. So far as we can see the Mexican ruler wants to free his beloved land from the yoke as did Lenine and Trotsky in Russia but Senor Calles has no such backing as the former Reds—hence is doomed to failure and probably an ignominious death at the hand of an assassin. This is about all there is to date for his government. On the other hand America finds herself posing as a guardian angel—for as in all such crisis she must protect her monopolized interests. Thousands of American dollars have found their way across the Gulf to Nicaragua where the country is rich in oils rubber and precious metals It only requires northern enterprise and ingenuity to extract these resources The natives never did and never will care. We'll do it for them and rob them to boot.

Hence the anxiety of President Coolidge and Secretary Kellogg, because a few ragmuffins in Nicaragua have run amuck and endeavored to set up a government of their own, against the rule of old Mexico. While we have nothing in common with these rebels, yet we must protect the good Yankee dollars, and if we ever engage in a real war, it will be strictly a war for the bloated investors, just like the other wars we ever indulged in Don't you think for one minute our people want war—far from it!

This week we received from a bunch of scared pacifists in New York City a proclamation addressed to President Coolidge and Secretary Kellogg beseeching them for humanity's sake to put the situation up to a diplomatic settlement which the two honorable gents at Washington will probably disregard. This proclamation was replete with the names of Reverends and college professors whose business is always ruined by war. However if the alarmed ones will dry their tears it may be a ray of hope is yet in view. It takes more than threats to breed a war, and this may mean another like the Tampico affair.

At the regular morning services of the First Baptist church of Pontiac as broadcasted last Sunday morning, the pastor announced there were 56 present from 20 or more miles away. This surely indicates the popularity of Rev. H. H. Savage, who remarked "I do not believe I would come 20 miles to hear myself speak." We should say churches were scarce up there or there is a different class of people. About North Adams it is considered a remarkable incident if sixteen people from three miles outside the corporation are present in real good weather.

Those who listened in Sunday evening on the air had the pleasure of hearing from New York a lecture of short duration from Prince William of Sweden who is traveling in this country as a lecturer. He spoke on his trip to Africa upon a hunting expedition at which time our Theodore Roosevelt was also in Africa hunting big game. Prince William is a world famous traveler and he told of meeting the immense gorillas in the forests of the dark continent. He says these beasts often weigh 350 to 400 pounds and are very dangerons if molested. His party followed tracks of a gorilla band and finally came upon them in a ravine where they were resting A shot from a powerful rifle went through the shoulder of one of the males and he rolled down a little knoll and they supposed he was dead. They soon realized the mistake when he came on with terrible roars. However another well aimed shot got him. The other gorillas escaped. This is only one of Prince Williams many experiences in the big game country.

Watch Out For The Fumes

Many, many times we have echoed the warning to our readers "Watch out for the deadly monoxide gases from your auto exhaust in a closed garage" and again we call attention to the fact that this gas is unnoticed until it overcomes a person. If you start your machine never fail to open the door at once, since you might seat yourself in the car and then be found dead a few minutes later without ever knowing "what hit you." We have often noticed the kids hooking on behind a passing car and thought each time what it meant. These little shavers ought to be warned to carry a long rope if they must hook on, a very dangerous practice at best.

All gasoline engines when running, generate monoxide gas, all gas stoves and heaters do the same if combustion is incomplete

This gas is deadly because it is an unstable compound requiring great quantities of oxygen, and when taken into the lungs it quickly absorbs the oxygen in the blood and lungs, producing inside asphyxiation. A person may be literally immersed in monoxide gas and never suspect it until he begins to grow dizzy or paralyzed Then follows unconsciousness and death. If you want to make repairs or adjustments with the engine running, do it in the open or throw open doors and windows

Athletics

North Adams Basket Ball fans were given a rare treat last week All the teams in town were busy. The High School entertained Jonesville before a packed house Saturday night. The girls game we expected to win was lost after a harder struggle than the score indicates. Jonesville ran up 12 points in the first half. A few changes for the North Adams team and Jonesville was outplayed in the last half. The twelve point lead proved to be too much of an obstacle and the end found us on the short end 15 to 7.

The boys' game was doubtful, and brought about a very pleasant surprise to all local supporters of the team. North Adams started out and were leading 6 to 2 at half time. Wylie and Meyer put up a wonderful exhibition of close guarding. The fact can be easily understood when you observe all three of Jonesville's points came on fouls. Inability of Jonesville to count on fouls and long tries at the basket, brought their defeat. The offense of North Adams was led by Captain Williams who was given fine support by Wattles. Roberts and Hersh, were working smoothly.

Coaches Willett and Radabaugh were well pleased with the game because of the losses suffered in previous games. They feel the jinx has been shaken off at least for a time. Friday night the teams will meet Onsted at that town.

Saturday night the Panthers seeking revenge for a beating administered by Hanover the week before, and not caring who they picked on, went out and cleaned up the Hellers at Montpeliar, O.. 38 to 22.

The Orioles were a good outfit and proved it to some extent, but they were unfortunate in picking the Panthers on this particular evening. Radabaugh and "Tiny" Baber protected the basket for North Adams when it was in danger. "Keith" Williams scored nine times from the floor which helped the local cause a great deal Don Thornton was also in good form. No game has been scheduled for this Saturday, but negotiations are under way to bring a good team here for a game the following week.

We like the way people have responded to our request to pay up before February 1st. It shows there is still some interest in keeping the paper alive. We most sincerely thank the merchants and business men who have advertised in our columns, and we believe you would do more if you were able.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FIVE

"Peter! Oh, la, la!" Roberta exclaimed, in an anomalous tone that might have meant indignation, or amusement, or merely intense surprise. Panic-sticken, Piggy released her and backed away. "What did you do that for?"

"Dunno. I—I guess it was just because I wanted to."

"Are you sorry?"

"No!"

"Well, you ought to be," she said severely. "I've trusted you, and—what made you do a thing like that?"

"Dunno. I never did before."

"Naturally, I know that."

"I mean, I—Inever kissed any girl before—not since I was grown up."

"Galahad?"

Piggy jumped. "What's that?"

"You know who Galahad was, don't you?" she scornfully inquired. "Are you trying to make yourself out his double?"

"Not on our life I'm not!" said Piggy, with a leap in her direction—and kissed her again.

"You must be crazy!"

"Well, maybe I am." Once more he withdrew, rubbing the ear she had cuffed. "I guess we both are. Nobody but lunatics would have tried to pull that stunt tonight."

"But it worked," she whispered, glowing again. "Celia's here! If only the rest goes as well—"

"The rest's a snap," quoth Piggy, and floated to his room on a sublimated sea of elation, forgetting that when the gods would cast down they first make confident.

The tint of Piggy's locks, as he had said, was beginning to show deterioration. The hair had assumed a slightly greenish cast at the ends, while nearer the scalp, owing to Robert's lack of experience in applying dye, the color was uneven, with a suggestion of bright brown at the roots.

The morning after their successful raid he decided to indulge in the luxury of a shampoo before submitting to the redyeing process, and an hour or so after breakfast, armed with a big pitcher of hot water, he retired to his room, whence presently issued sounds of wrath and consternation.

"Bob!" he roared, throwing open the door. "Bob!"

"What's the matter?" Roberta emerged from Celia's room to behold him in his doorway, shirtsleeved and collarless, staying with a towel the streams of water that trickled from his inky crown.

"This darn stuff don't wash off!"

"What? Oh, it must! Let me try."

"I tell you it won't come off. I've scrubbed and scrubbed, and all it does is to make it a little greener."

"Oh, la, la!" said Roberta, dumfounded.

"What'll I do? Have I got to wear green hair for the rest of my life?"

"I—Idon't know. Wouldn't that be awful! Let's ask Janet."

This personage, hastily summoned, regarded him with a pessimistic eye, remarking that he was beginning to gather the wages o' sin. Pressed, she reluctantly admitted that doubtless time would wipe away the stain, replacing the present capillary stigma with a new growth of natural color.

"But ye'll be pieba'd the whiles," she grimly prophesied. "Or else ye'll go with shaven head, like the criminal ye arre."

"Oh—well—that's not so bad. Thanks."

Relieved, he closed his door again. Afterwards, the gifted Janet, upon whom years and experience had bestowed many strange accomplishments, gloomily and with consummate skill, stained each and every hair jet black to its root.

He then sought the tavern to learn what men might report of the night, and had difficulty in restraining his emotion until he regained the seclusion of his rented walls. There he slammed the door and dropped into a chair, releasing pent-up yells of laughter.

Roberta, chattering upstairs with Celia, who had taken her breakfast in bed, ran down to him.

"What is it?" she implored. "Stop laughing and tell me."

"They've got him!" he gasped.

"Got whom?"

"The kidnapper. They caught him. The dogs—oh, wow!" Speech failed him, but presently he sat up, wiping his eyes, and explained, between splutters of mirth: "Those blessed pups treed him—treed the Whangdoodle!"

"The Whang—you mean Clif? How could they? Where was he?"

"Give it up. He must have been around somewhere, because the gardener heard the dogs and went to see what they had—and he found the Whangdoodle bird appropriately perched in a tree, still—oh, my!—still mourning for his lost—"

When he had recovered somewhat from that spasm, Roberta, who looked rather frightened, asked: "How do you know? Who told you all this?"

"Some men came over from Jaffrey this morning and spread the glad tidings. He said then thought at first that somebody had tried to set the barn afire. Then they missed Celia and heard the dogs on the hill, so the gardener chased over and nabbed Nixon up a tree. Now the theory is that he kidnapped Celia and turned her over to confederates, but failed to make his own get-away on account of the dogs."

"Poor Clif!"

"Serves him right for snooping."

"He may have seen us, Peter."

"He may, but I doubt it. If he had he'd have sung out—and given it away afterward." Piggy's opinion of a quitter was low. "They say he went up to the house and telephoned to the sheriffs and constables all over the place that Celia had been kidnapped and to watch out for her. You see what we'd have been up against if we'd tried to run. He sent for your father, too. He's on the way up here now, if he hasn't arrived. He won't do a thing to the Whangdoodle!" He whooped again, adding, when he could sufficiently control his vocal cords, "It's a good bluff, but it's pretty hard to put over anything on G. A."

"Bluff?"

He nodded, riot in his eyes. "The native sleuths have got it all doped out. That there Nixon feller's pretty smart, but he ain't any smarter'n we be, by jing! Theoretically, you see, if he hadn't been caught, he'd have chased off with Celia and the person or persons unknown who were his accomplices. But he WAS caught, so he immediately got busy on the telephone and warned everybody east, west and south to watch the roads, but he seems to have forgotten that there was anything north of here—and it isn't very far to the Canadian border. That will take some explaining," he concluded joyously.

"But it isn't fair, Peter? Clif had nothing to do with it."

"Except snooping around in the woods at night. Even so, he won't have to prove himself innocent. They will have to prove him guilty—and they can't do it.'

"Father won't wait for proof. If he gets an idea that Clif—" She broke off, troubled.

"Suppose he does? What can he do to Nixon?"

"I don't know. But ever since I discovered that detective following me I've had a notion that somehow father prevented Clif's meeting me that day. He may have so hold . . ."

CHAPTER THIRTY-SIX

Had either Roberta or Piggy suspected the straits in which Nixon found himself, their course would have been altered, with what outcome who can say? But having no faintest inkling of the dangers encompassing the Whangdoodle, Piggy said blithely:

"Get on your duds and let's go out."

"Out where?"

"Keene—to shop. This is the day when we must show ourselves."

"But—suppose Clif does suspect? He did yesterday, and he might come over here now to make sure."

"We'll have to take a chance on that. Anyhow, I've got a scheme. I'm going to hunt up the sheriff now and see if my new license plates have come. When I get back, we'll boldly sally forth and show we have nothing to fear."

Before setting out, however, he held a consultation with Janet, and together they invaded the attic, where sundry locked trunks belonging to the owner of the house were stored. Piggy's keys came into requisition and he left one of them with his lieutenant, who lingered aloft after he had descended. At Fitzwilliam Depot he obtained and affixed his New Hampshire license plates and heard from the sheriff further details and theories anent the abduction, returning them to the house for Roberta.

No sooner had they rolled away than Janet routed Celia from her bed and stationed her at the window, like Sister Anne, to watch for a cloud of dust, herself stripping the bed and restoring the room to its former unused aspect. She finished none too quickly, for before she had reached the foot of the stairs on her way to the kitchen, she heard Celia's frightened voice from the hall above.

"Janet! My father! He's coming, with two other men. Oh, what shall I do?"

"Up wi' ye tae the garret? Quick, noo!" said Janet, suiting action to word. With astonishing nimbleness for one of her years, she propelled the limping girl up the narrow stairway, and sixty seconds later—one of which she used to smooth her sleek white hair and pat her cuffs into place—she composedly opened the door in response to repeated impatient knocking.

Events had not tended to make either Scott or Nixon, who accompanied him, patient. The former's temper, roiled at the Monday morning conference, where he received Brazenose's unqualified refusal to sell his plant and in retaliation gave formal notice of the cancellation of their contract, had not cleared when he was aroused from belated sleep to answer the telephone call from Nixon, who began to explain that during a fire, evidently of incendiary origin—

"Fire? What burned? Scott interrupted.

"Nothing except some wood piled behind the barn and soaked with gasloine. There's no damage. But—"

"Where were the dogs? Poisoned?"

"No, they were outside the fence," said Nixon, who knew whereof he spoke.

"They couldn't get outside, unless the wire was cut, and then they'd get in again."

"Well, they didn't. Celia's gone."

"What? What's that?"

"Celia—has—disappeared, went during the fire—probably with Roberta."

"Has she been there?"

"Nobody seen her, but Celia's gone."

Scott swore comprehensively before it occurred to him to inquire how Nixon happened to be on the spot. No explanation was forthcoming.

"I'll tell you about that later. You'd better come up."

"You bet I'll come up—straight."

"I've notified officers along every route to New York and Boston—"

"You've what?"

"Notified officers to watch for Celia."

"You're a damn fool!" Scott liked publicity no better than did the elder Brazenose, and his faith in political appointees in general and rural peace officers in particular was slight. "Stay there until I come."

He slammed the receiver into the hook, jerking it down immediately to call Cody. Again they drove all night, even more rapidly than on the earlier occasion, a week before. The only reason they were not arrested for speeding was that nobody could overtake them, motorcycles being fewer than now.

When Scott had heard the whole story, he raged. Everyone at Birchwood, with the single exception of the dogs, was under suspicion. The gardener, whom the dogs obeyed, was accused of putting them off the property with malice prepence and the patched wire he had discovered proved no alibi. Mrs. Scott, twice false to her trust, had succumbed to Roberta's wiles; the maids had been bribed; between them all they had arranged the fire in a preposterous attempt to pull wool over his eyes. And Nixon, caught in the act, captured and held by the trusty dogs, what had he to say for himself?

Nixon had a good deal to say. He had believed Roberta to be in the vicinity—

"You knew she was. I thought at the time that you came here Saturday morning as a blind."

"I did not. I didn't know then where Roberta was and I don't now. I did know that she was bent upon seeing Celia, and I intended to prevent it—for reasons that nobody understands better than you."

"You'll understand 'em better yourself before I'm through with you. Well?"

Tren came the story of the night walk, the whistle on the hill, and Nixon's suspicion; his scramble through the brush, ended by the encounter with the dogs. The cat had not been discovered and was his own secret. Subsequent proceedings had interested him vitally, but as participation in them had been impossible, he could offer only hearsay evidence up to the moment when the gardener had called off the besiegers, after which he had done everything in his power to insure the capture of the fugitives.

"But there is this," he added, hastily, as Scott grunted and took breath for another diatribe. "Yesterday I rode around through several of these little towns on the chance of seeing Roberta somewhere, and over in a village called Fitzwilliam I saw a woman of about her height and build, in deep mourning."

"Dit you speak to her?"

"No. But I went to the only store in the place—manufactured an errand—and asked about her. She's said to be a Mrs. Smith, from the West and recently widowed. She arrived there last Tuesday—"

"Huh! And you didn't follow her?"

"Wait. She came in her own car—a five-passenger touring car, I learned afterward—with a chauffeur and a maid, both of whom claim to have worked for her for years. She has taken a furnished house. Now, I don't believe Roberta has enough money to do all that—but the woman did move like her."

"She's probably cleared out by this time. But since you've advertised this affair all over the place, we'll go and see. Come along."

CHAPTER THIRTY-SEVEN

On the way to Fitzwilliam Scott told Nixon what he might expect if it was not clearly demonstrated that he had had no hand in Celia's abduction. It was not a pleasant drive.

Arrived there, Nixon learned at the store that the Smith house lay down a lonely road at the edge of the village and was without neighbors, but detected no indication that the menage had dissolved into thin air over night. Before visiting it Scott insisted upon obtaining a search warrant. The sheriff, amazed, said that there was nothing wrong with Mrs. Smith; her shofer had been to see him about some business that very morning. But Scott, arbitrary as usual, would accept no refusal. He argued that nobody knew anything about this woman who had arrived only a week before and might be a clever crook. His daughter had been kidnapped and by this and by that he intended to investigate every suspicious house in the state, if necessary. The sheriff scratched his head, admitting that the lady had been unable to give any references, and eventually, not averse to an active share in the excitement, consented to accompany them. A few minutes later the three stood on Mrs. Smith's porch, hammering at the door until Janet composedly opened it.

"I fant to see Mrs. Smith," Scott said brusquely.

"She's not in." Her tone was serene, her dignity unruffled.

"Where is she?"

"I think she went to Keene, sir."

"Well, I'm going to search this house. This is the sheriff. A young lady has disappeared and I believe she's here."

"Ye may search the house and welcome, since ye have the law with ye. But it is a hard way to treat a lady like her. Ye'll find nobody here but me."

She flung wide the door, and the three entered; Nixon and the sheriff, impressed by the old Scotswoman's austere, aggressive respectability, already convinced that they pursued a wild goose. Nevertheless, the house was thoroughly searched, Janet, calm and disdainful, following them about. Scott peered into closets and under beds and behind large pieces of furniture, coming at last to the door to the attic.

"What's up here?" he demanded, opening it.

"The garret, sir."

He mounted, discovering only cobwebbed beams, an array of locked and dusty trunks, two or three decrepid chairs, a heap of nondescript articles piled upon a broken trunk tray and covered with an old carriage rug, and several rolls of wall paper.

Satisfied that no one coud be secreted in the house, he led his party to the barn, returning baffed, to the kitchen door, where Janet stood, dour and rigid, following their investigations with visible disapproval.

"Where did this Mrs. Smith come from?" Scott questioned.

"Ahe ye suspicious that maybe she hid the young lady in Seattle?" was the biting reply, and the sheriff ill-advisedly permitted himself to chuck e winning a glare from Scott before that gentleman again attempted to bore through to Janet's soul with his penetrating gaze.

"How long have you worked for her?"

"I worked for the master many a year before ever he saw her, and for his father and mother before him. Thirty years I've been in the family, and this is the first time I've ever seen a house searched by a sheriff. But then, we've lived always among gentlefolk".

Even Scott was not armored against that shaft. His flush deepened, and under the old woman's steady scrutiny he found himself constrained to a certain explanation.

"H'mph! My daughter was kidnapped last night. We're trying to find her, and something I'd heard of Mrs. Smith— Well— sorry to have troubled you. Come on, Clif. We'll go to Keene."

With that they took themselves off, and Janet ascended again to the attic. She unlocked a trunk, from which Celia thrust a pallid and perspiring face.

"Have they gone?"

"Aye, the gomerals! Trampin' through the lad's hoose wi' sairch warrant! Much they found! Come, lass, come back tae yer bed.'

CHAPTER THIRTY-EIGHT

Knowing nothing of these drastic proceedings, Peter Brown drove Mrs. Smith to Keene and exhibited her on the streets of that metropolis, quite as if nothing had happened. While she negotiated with butcher, baker and candlestick maker, he sat outside in the car, or lounged on the curb, exchanging greetings with occasional passing acquaintances, eyes and ears open.

For the first time he saw some of the persons whom he had dreaded meeting; the parents of a fraternity brother, in whose home Piggy Brazenose had been a frequent and welcome guest, and the sister of another, with whom he had often danced, all lingering late in their summer abodes at Dublin. But they gave him only the cursory glance accorded to any stranger in a small community, and his breath came more evenly.

The whole square buzzed—as far as it is possible for Keene to buzz—with exaggerated report, theory, and conjecture concerning the affair at Birchwood, to all of which Mrs. Smith's chauffeur listened with an outlander's unbiased detachment.

Local feeling ran high and disputes were numerous. Scott was a dictatorial tyrant, deserving the worst that could befall him; Scott was an able man, carrying ably the cares and responsibilities of wealth and a vauable member of the community. Celia was insane; in a maniacal frenzy she had attempted to burn the house and all its inmates, fleeing to the woods herself, probably to drown in one of the many lakes. Contrariwise, Celia was a pitiful, maltreated victim, kept for some trivial offense, by a parent who brooked no sightest opposition to his whims. Or again, Celia was a high-stepper, like that sister of hers who had flared up and left home (and no wonder, considering what she had had to put up with, said the opposition), and who was now living all alone in Paris, because she wouldn't submit to any guidance whatever. Things had come to a pretty pass when grown girls had to be locked up to keep them at home where they belonged.

These extremes of opinion and all shades between were bruited about the square, and certain of them came to the ears of Peter Brown, who harkened impartially contributing only the statement that Jim Cody said old Scott wasn't so bad to work for, if you watched your step. It was evident to all who spoke to him that his interest in the matter was entirely impersonal, though he welcomed any incident breaking the monotony of a chauffeur's life in Fitzwilliam. Urged to hazard a guess as to what had become of Celia, he opined that whoever had taken her, provided the theory of abduction were correct, had borne her in haste to Canada. The distance to the boarder was comparatively short and the towns between comparatively few.

He was standing before a drug store, Roberta making some small purchtses inside, when some one exclaimed:

"There's Scott now. Looks as if he'd bite a spike in two. Who's that with him? S'pose that's the fellow they caught up a tree?"

Piggy turned, to see the familiar black car, Scott and Nixon in the tonneou, Cody, gray faced from weariness, at the wheel. The chauffeur drew up between the City Hall, which the others immediately entered. Piggy went into the drug store.

"Get out of here as soon as you can," he whispered to Roberta. "They're both in town and the Whangdoodle might take a notion to speak to you, if he met you on foot. They're in the City Hall now. Watch your chance and slip out. I'll take the car down this side street and around the first corner the the left. Meet you there."

Having driven the car to the spot indicated, he sauntered back and across the square to speak to Cody.

"Hello, Jim. You look done up."

"I'm near dead. Drove all night, an' it looks like I was goin' to crve all day."

"Hear you're having a hot time over at your house."

"Hot time is right. We're havin' hell. The old man's——"

Cody broke off as Nixon come out alone and approached them. Piggy glanced at him and stepped back; but something in the tall young chauffeur's figure, or bearing—or perhaps in his eyes—impressed Nixon as vaguely familiar, and he looked at him sharply.

"Haven't I seen you before somewhere?"

"Couldn't say, sir," Piggy cooly replied, without the flicker of an eyelash, as he saluted. "Maybe, if you come from Seattle."

"Oh, you're from Seattle, are you?" Nixon's eyes narrowed. This then, was Mrs. Smith's chauffeur. Affably he entered into conversation, professing an interest in the Washington city and finding the other at least as familiar with its characteristics and environs as he was himself.

Maneuvering craftily, Piggy contrived to draw Nixon around until his back was toward the drug store. Presently he saw Roberta hurry out and disappear in the direction of the appointed rendevous.

"I've got to get back to my car, sir," he said then. "Mrs. Smith might want me."

"Is she shopping?" the other inquired, turning quickly to sweep the square with his glance in the hope of espying the small, erect figure that had aroused his suspicion.

"No, sir. She's at a house over there a ways—dressmaker's, I guess. She said she'd be there about half an hour and the time's up."

Saluting again, he nodded to Cody and strode away. Nixon looked after him, still puzzled by that vague resemblance to some one he could not identify, but the mental query was speedily submerged by weightier problems. As they drove back to Birchwood, he said to Scott:

"By the way, I ran across that chauffeur of Mrs. Smith's in Keene, and had a talk with him. He seems all right. Intelligent young chap with a steady eye, and he knows all about Seattle. He corroborated the old woman's story, too, about the length of time she's been with the family, and says he's worked for them three years. He says Smith died a few weeks ago and his widow intended to spend the winter in New York, but she's not well and couldn't stand the noise, so she came up here to be quiet. An aunt is coming to stay with her later. He answered questions readily and told a straight story, so I guess that was a false scent."

"False scents seems to be your strong suit," Scott growled. "You'd better lead trumps, if you want to save your bacon—and lead 'em damn quick."

MICHICAN MAN AS CAPTIVE UNHURT

Adventure touches the individual sing-song life so rarely that Dr. Harvey, Harvard, University of Michigan alumnus (1904) and now of Pekin Union Medical college, must figure he got his at a bargain, for all the grime, inconvenience and heart flutters.

Even if ten weeks as the captive of Chinese bandits kept the doctor's hair on the end and rough yellow hands tore out whole pages from his catechism, he came out with whole skin, and a whole skin is fair salvage from such an adventure. Certainly life if fuller dressing bullet wounds than tending croup or telling anxious ladies how to keep thin.

On the night of July 19, Palmer, host of Dr. Howard, was awakened and told by worried farmers that, for the second time in six weeks, bandits had settled down, like destructive locusts, on one of the largest Chinese hamlets on his ranch.

Palmer promised help. He tried to interest a small detachment of the Chinese soldiers quartered on the ranch. They replied that they had been assigned to guard ranch headquarters only. With bland condidence, Palmer then decided to lead out a company of seven, Howard included, in the naive belief that a few shots fired over the heads of the marauders would scare them away.

That there were 72 bandits mounted and well armed, gives some idea of the insanity of Palmer's military reasoing. The flaw in the arrangements was that the bandits didn't scare. They kept coming in face of the fire. Palmer was killed. One is apt to think his "courage" more a silly aplomb, and his ridiculous offensive one that could have had no other end. Howard was taken captive.

The bandits put in a demand for ransom money, cut all telegraph and telephone wires, and galloped away to their mountain rendevouz with Howard in tow.

COAST GUARDS GO TO AID FISHERMEN AT GRAND MARAIS

Members of the Eagle Harbor, Portage lake ship canal and Marquette coast guard stations have left for Duluth, where they will board power boat enroute to Grand Marais, to spend the remainder of the winter patroling the north shore. The crew received no definite orders upon leaving the upper peninsula, but believe they have been called to the west end of the lake by a petition from Grand Marais fishermen who sought coast guard protection during the rough weather throughout the winter.

The Grand Marais district is kept open all year and hundreds of fishermen ply their trade in these waters, where fish abound. The storms come suddenly in winter and are of severe nature. Often the fishing tugs are caught far from shore and reach a haven only after a protracted fight against the elements. To assist them against such emergencies they have enlisted the interest of the coast guard.

BEAR HUNTING IS HELD PRIME SPORT

Most hunters would rather bag a fine bear in good pelage than any other species of American game. There is just enough of the spice of danger to give zest to a bear hunt. Michigan has stopped the trapping of bears and prohibits killing them except in the deer season.

In many states the bear is unprotected and in some it is even regarded as predatory and classed as "vermine.' All this, says the American Game Protective Association, is wrong. They believe that bears should be classified as game just as deer, moose, elk, sheep, and other large animals are, and should have an open and a closed season to protect the bear during the breeding season, and to limit hunting to that season when the flesh is suitable for food and the fur is prime.

The bear is equipped with wonderfully keen scene and can detect a hunter for at least half a mile when wind conditions are right. His hearing is equally good and it tests the skill of the best hunters to approach them within shooting distance. Its eyesight is not keen.

NORMAL COACH IS OPTIMISTIC OVER TRACK MEET WINS

Notwithstanding the los of seven stars, Coach Olds is optimistic over Michigan Normal college's prospects for indoor and outdoor track meets.

Over 125 athletes interested in track were enrolled. Because of inadequate facilities much of the preliminary work will be done at Yost Field House at Ann Arbor.

Captain Otto, Yeardy and Potter, who were not in school last team, are back. Otto is a dash man who has established several records. Yeardy is a high jumper and Potter a distance man.

U. S. SCOFFS AT GROUND HOG DAY

Weather conditions on certain days of the year do not control the elements for long periods in the future, the United States weather bureau announced, warning superstitious persons not to put their faith in absurd weather predictions.

For example, the bureau pointed out, many people believe in forecasts starting from certain supposedly important key or control dates in the year.

"It is said that as the first of January is, so will be all the rest of the month; that the second day of January—though itself already ruled by the first—determines the weather for February, and strangely enough also that the following September and the third of January, likewise, ruled by the first, is a model of the coming month," the government bureau stated.

"The third of January is also credited for fixing the weather of the following nine weeks. If we go on to St. Paul's day, January 25, we find assurance that if it be fine so will all the rest of the year be."

The weather bureau discredits all such forecasts and advises the public against believing in them. The bureau also pointed out that the elements following Ground Hog Day or Candlemas day, February 2, are not ruled 40 days thereafter by conditions on that day.

"The only reliable guide to weather behavior is the record of what has happened in the past, and as such records show considerable variety in the weather as a rule, it is absurd to base long distance prophecies on them," the bureau said.

SMALL SPUD CROP BRINGS BIG MONEY

The small Michigan potato crop of 1925 was worth nearly four times as much as the bountiful crop of 1924, it is revealed by the summary of the 1925-26 season just issued by R. H. Shoemaker, in charge of the government market news service.

In 1924 a Michigan crop of 33,800,000 bushels was valued at $11,830,000. In 1925 a crop of 24,411,000 bushels was valued at $39,546,000.

"The reduction in yield during 1925 was probably due in greatest measure to several protracted dry periods during the latter part of the growing season. This was very unusual, as much of Michigan's potato crop generally is 'made' during September.

"The 1925 season, however, proved to be the exception, and the October 1 estimates of production were slightly reduced from the September 1 figures."

$500,000 IS TOLL OF SHOP LIFTERS

Detroit's business boll-weevil is taking toll of $500,000 a year on the city's department stores.

Shoplifters, from the meanest of them, to the most cunning who walk out of exclusive shops with fur coats valued at thousands of dollars, all add the sum of their thefts to the burden which must be borne by the consumer.

In all businesses there is a certain percentage of loss. In department stores the highest percentage of losses is placed at the door of the shoplifter and the illegal buyer.

Illegal purchasing is a new menace to Detroit shops. It is the purchase of goods on charge accounts of other people. Recently one woman was arrested after she "bought" and was about to take from the store $235 in merchandise. A subsequent checking up of her activities revealed that she had "bought" in the same manner merchandise valued at $1800 within the two weeks preceding Christmast.

Of course, this sort of theft is commonest during the rush of the holiday shopping season. When purchases are made and charged at other times, employes are careful in checking the purchaser. Detroit stores are taking elaborate precautions against this system of thievery and expect to reduce it to a minimum.

VI[illegible] 158 YEARS OLD IS [illegible]ILL PRODUCING GRAPES

Probably the most productive grapevine in the world is the royal vine at Hampton Court, England. The vine is 158 years old and has been known to produce as many as 2,200 bunches of grapes a year. Up to 20 years ago it yielded an average of 1,000 bunches a year. With its average crop now kept down to about 500 bunches, it maintains remarkable health. The proceeds go to the exchequer, as do also the gate receipts from the thousands of persons who pay a penny to see the vine. Last year 280,000 persons paid the admission fee.

YOST'S OLD TEAM WILL OPEN BOWL AT MICHIGAN UNIVERSITY

When Ohio Wesleyan meets Michigan in foot ball at Ann Arbor next fall in the first game in the new Wolverine bowl, the contest will have an unique background.

It was Fielding H. Yost, for years Michigan's head gridiron coach, who coached the Wesleyan eleven of 1897 to a 0 to 0 "victory" over the Wolverines in the first of the two games Michigan and Wesleyan have played. And Yost played tackle on the team he was coaching and was paid to do it!

"In those days," says Summer ("Doc") Welch, now famous as Wesleyan's perennial "unpaid coach," "there weren't any rules. We hadn't a paid coach until Yost came up from Morgantown. We got a little money together and sent down to get him to come up and coach and play tackle."

It is recorded that Yost tore great holes in the Michigan line and that Welch smashed his way through the Wolverines repeatedly, gaining first nation-wide notice for Ohio Wesleyan. Yost's coaching brought Wesleyan the only championship it had until 1922, when George Gauthier began turning out title winning elevens for Wesleyan.

RUST FATAL TO PINE TREE WARNED AGAINST BY U. S.

The United States department of Agriculture is sending out warnings regarding a potentially dangerous gall rust disease which acects pine trees.

Forest entomologists are uncertain where the disease came from, just what it is and how many different species of trees it will attack. It was found first upon Scotch pine, a European species of relative unimportance for timber. For want of a better name to it, the scientists have called it the Woodgate rust, from the name of the town in New York state where it was first uncovered.

On one tree 15 feet tall over 18,000 galls were counted and the branches above the infection had died. It is considered particularly fatal to tree growth it attacks.

MUSKEGON FIREMAN FOR 47 YEARS IS RETIRED

Forty-seven years a city fireman, without having been late for work or reprimanded by his superiors, is the record of Capt. Harry F. Dewitt, 82 years ald, who retired January 1 on half pay by Muskegon city.

The last year was eventful for Capt. DeWitt. In adition to his retirement, the veteran fireman was reunited with a brother, missing for 50 years. The brother, who had served in the army for years, searched some time before he located Capt. DeWitt. One evening, with Chief Napoleon Belfy, the brother went to Capt. DeWitt's home, and received a forman introduction to his brother.

MILLION YEARLY ADDED TO STATE FARM WEALTH

Michigan agricultural wealth is increasing at the rate of $1,000,000 a year through the work of an army of insects, according to State Commissioner of Agriculture L. Whitney Watkins.

These insects are honey bees which annually produce 10,000,000 pounds of honey. There are between 12,000 and 15,000 beekeepers in Michigan, most of whom make a profit by "farming bees."

WORLD TOUR FOR STUDENT, PLAN

A. J. McIntosh, who organized the University of Michigan trip around the world, which is now in progress, has arranged for the trip for 1927 in conjunction with the Cunard line.

The project is now sufficiently established to justify the use of one of the modern vessels and the Cunard line will furnish the steamer Aurania, built in 1924. The educational program will be under the name of the International University Cruise.

This year's party consists of about 300 men students, 100 women students and 100 older people. They supplement each other in sports, music, dramatics and the other daily activities.

The entire project is unique. Nothing could be more different from the tourist parties on shipboard whose objectives are social affairs, dancing, bridge and general sightseeing.

Not to study is unknown, because the class work and lectures are enthusiastically interesting—if you are not interested in discussing the Panama canal, the Japanese question in Hawaii, the future of China or the wonderful government of Java and such subjects, you simply don't belong—as there are no other subjects of conversation.

OPENING DATE CHANGE IN GRID SEASON SEEN AS CHAMP SOLUTION

Foot ball championships are easy to settle in the western conference without that body being forced to lower its eligibility standards, or placing an over-emphasis upon the game.

By moving up the close of the season to the second Saturday in November, there would still be an open Saturday on which the two undefeated teams, or those with the highest percentage, could meet and settle the title. That change would necessitate the commencement of practice Septmeber 8 and the opening of the season the last Saturday of September instead of the first in October.

Over commercialization charges could be ridiculed. Rotate the place for the championship game each year. Every decade, each of the schools in the conference would stage it. Let the receipts aside from expenses be prorated among the members and be devoted to intramural athletics.

Another method would pro rate the money with the stipulation that it be turned over to worthy students not connected in any way with athletics.

By closing the season a week earlier, the players not involved in the championship game would have ample time to catch up in their back work and the school as a whole settle down to study before Thanksgiving. Only in the case of those qualifying for the title would the season be prolonged beyond the legal point. That would give two schools a ninth game on their respective schedules and leave the others with eight each.

MEMPHIS CHURCH BUILD IN 1842 IS OLDEST IN STATE

One of the oldest churches in this state, still giving service, is the Memphis Congregational church, which was built in 1842, during the pastorate of Rev. Charles Kellogg, being the first pastor. The building was enlarged and remodeled in 1894, when choir rooms and a prayer meeting room were added. Two long pastorates, totaling 52 years, are worthy of note: Rev. William P. Russell, who began his ministry here in 1848 and continued until his death in 1880; Rev. E. H. Eppens, who filled the pulpit 20 years, 1898 to 1918. Rev. Mr. Russell performed 397 marriage ceremonies while pastor of this church.

TRADE CONVENTION TO BE HELD IN DETROIT IN MAY

The call for the fourteenth national foreign trade convention to be held in Detroit May 25-27 was sent out by O. K. Davis, secretary of the National Foregn Trade Council. The call was issued by James A. Farrell, chairman of the council. This will be the first time in six years the foreign traders have met in any inland city. Detroit's invitation was accepted because this is the center of 14 of the greatest industries in the United States.

The foreign trade problems of the automobile industry will have a leading place on the program.

ACCESSORIES ADD TO STYLE VARIETY

Just as we think that we have completed the winter wardrobe, dozens of new accessories are thrust before us, to say nothing of mid-winter style innovations and silhouette changes. The well-dressed person is forever buying new highlights for her wardrobe. The style slogan seems to be, "If at first you don't succeed, buy, buy again."

No sooner were we becoming accustomed to the new galoshes of tan, gray, red and green cloth than gorgeous footgear appeared in the shape of Russian boots. These modern boots fit more snugly to the leg than did the regulation Russian boot. They are lizard or snakeskin, of plain black satin and of heavy suede. One of the most attractive models has a black patent lower, shaped exactly like a rubber overshoe, and a snakeskin upper which terminates in a narrow band of black patent at the top. The one drawback to the Russian boot is that it cannot be worn over a slipper successfully, since it fits the foot perfectly.

Evening scarfs of georgette or chiffon, studded with brilliants or pailletted at the ends, are among the new evening novelties. How far scarfs have traveled since the days when they wore old-fashioned wool crocheted ones over their heads at evening time! The demand for individual scarfs has become so great that such artists as John Held, Jr., are using their signatures on original scarfs designed by them. One shop featuring Mr. Held's scarf and kerchief sets says that the demand for his jazz figures of overwhelming. The scarf designs are used in allover manner for border effect. The kerchief has but the single motif in one corner.

Fur handbags are another novelty which many women are utilizing. Calf skin envelope shapes in large and small sizes match the popular calfskin turbans and add a smartness to the mid-winter ensemble.

Whereas velvet evening gowns held the front of the stage during the earlier part of the season, we find beaded and pailleted chiffons and georgettes stepping to the front. The holiday season of tinsel is perhaps responsible for the present demand for glittering evening frocks. Straight-lined models rule triumphantly.

SNOW SLIDE BEING BUILT FROM ROOF OF STADIUM

A toboggan slide from the top of the Michigan State stadium, ending in an open field, is now under construction. Coach John Kobs, the hockey mentor and an enthusiast for winter sports in general, is directing the building of the big slide. College students are assisting.

Hockey has apparently not found the favor of college students. Only six men have reported for the squad, and since this is the number used on a team, Coach Kobs isn't given much latitude in selecting a combination.

Praise is wasted on folks who are eternally looking for it.

SYMPHONY' SPONSOR PLAYED IN CITY'S FIRST SCHOOL BAND

Thousands of Detroiters who have listened to the Detroit Symphony orchestra have seen William H. Murphy and his family in the left hand box at Orchestra hall and have heard the famous Murphy organ. Yet there are but a comparative few who know that the owner of the box and the donor of the organ was once leader of an orchestra.

There probably was never a time in the Detroit millionaire's life time when he was not interested in music. When he arrived in Detroit at the age of 11 years from Bangor, Maine, the place of his birth, he had a taste for music. A few years later he formed the first high school orchestra in this city, and in 1873 joined the first Detroit Musical society.

The president of the Detroit Symphony orchestra was on the other side of the foot lights in the '70's. He was the second violin in that first assembly of 35 musicians. Mrs. William Gray and Mrs. Alexander Sibley were the accompanists.

STATE ACTS TO HELP TOURISTS

Nothing is more desolate and tiresome than a burned over area of timberland. Blackened stumps and stubs, white ash patches, erosion-washed gullies and bare rocks are not conducive to pleasant thoughts and tourists will seldom drive through such a region if they know of a route to the same destination leading through green groves. When we consider that eight million tourists visited Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan last year alone, leaving some $400,000,000 in their wake, we must realize that everything must be done to undo the work of the timber harvester who left northern Michigan a desert waste in spots. Michigan drew more than 3,000,000 of the 8,000,000 tourists. Michigan also sold 75,000 fishing permits to non-residents as against 60,000 for Wisconsin and 28,000 for Minnesota.

The people of the Upper Peninsula are alive to the situation and a movement throughout that district is doing much to save roadside trees and other beauty spots from the despoilation of lumbermen and others. By gifts and by purchases the state hopes to hold the roadside beauties as they now exist.

LAKES ARE SOUGHT FOR HUNT AREAS

The acquisition of lake frontage in northern Michigan by private interests from Michigan and out-of-state cities is fulfilling predictions of far-seeing upper peninsula sportsmen, who several years ago visioned the period when territory encircling northern peninsula inland lakes would triple in valuation and attract capital from distant centers.

The activities of lumbermen were denuding the wilderness tracts of the upper peninsula of their forst growth. With the vanishing of the woodlands came a slump n the property valuation, and a decrease in its attraction for tourists and resort purposes. However, a beautiful cover of second growth trees sprung up on territory logged years ago, and it is toward lake frontage amid such surroundings that many residents of Michigan have turned covetous eyes. Lakes located in areas recently lumbered, and which still carry the unsightly heaps of slash left by the loggers, also are being sought, prospective buyers looking to the time when a cover of second growth will hide the ravages of man.

The invasion of the outside purchaser is yet too small to attract the attention of the ordinary citizen of Northern Michigan. Only in a few localities has he exerted any influence and aroused public interest by the acquisition of lake frontage, which previously afforded hunting and fishing territory for the habitants. There are hundreds of lovely lakes with attractive forest settings in northern Michigan, which rarely have been seen or heard of by outsiders. Although they may offer ideal fishing, swimming and boating facilities, their potential value is not great, since the average citizen accepts them as a matter of course.

In practically every city and village in the upper peninsula, however, there are individuals who are beginning to realize as the influx of tourist visitors increases each season, that upper peninsula lakes some day will be a valuable investment.

4 POISON SNAKES ONLY ONES IN U S.

Dr. R. L. Ditmars, America's foremore authority on reptiles, says:

"After having been in contact with an interested public asking many questions about poisonous snakes, during the last 25 years, I have noted that most of the queries relates to the poisonous varieties encountered in the United States proper. The answer is simple, as there are only four—the rattle snake, copperhead, water moccasin and coral snake.

"Rattle snakes occur in every state, although extremely rare in Maine and of scant numbers in Vermont and New Hampshire. The westerly states along the northern boundary can not boast of this scarcity of the rattler, which extends well into Canada.

"Second in rank to the extent of its ristribution is the copperhead. Its range begins with a blunt point in southern Massachusetts and extends southward to northern Florida, widening to include New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, Southern Kansas, Oklahoma and a considerable portion of Texas.

"The water moccasin or cotton-mouth, a near and larger relative, is restricted to the sontheastern states, from central North Caroline, throughout Florida and westward to Texas. It ranges a bit up the Mississippi and Ohio, into southern Missouri and Illinois.

"The fourth kind, the coral snake (actually two species) occurs over the same area as the cotton-mouth and again along the boundary in Arizona and New Mexico.

SCIENCE CURBES BUDDING CRIME

Very sanguine indeed would be the interpid youth still inclined to essay a floyer in crime after inspection of the Identification Bureau of the Detroit Police department.

Roseate plans of high adventrue may lure the callow youth; the veteran knows that crime is a desperate game against overwhelming odds. Temporary crime waves to the contrary, criminology has become an exact science that precludes any possibility of a long criminal career. Refined methods of identification and notification have stacked the cards against the crook.

Examination of the police department bulletin board and the posters of "wanted" criminals bears eloquent testimony to the effectiveness of modern methods of identification. There is nothing vague or haphazard. The descriptions are amazingly revealing pictures of the mental and physical characteristics of every subject.

Accurate identification and rapid broadcasting of this information have combined to wage a relentless pursuit of the wrong doer. And the explanation of the success of such pursuit is found in the fact that every person is imprisoned by an inescapable self. Records of fugitive captures indicate very fashion is the fugitive able to alter or conceal the physical and mental qualities that make him a marked man throughout the world.

Fingerprints and photographs of course remain the simple, obvious means of identification, but police posters strikingly show the new importance of more subtle characteristics. Bertillon measurements seem to have lapsed into disuse. Political beliefs, social attitudes, musical and reading preferences and emotional reactions have become important descriptive qualities.

The Civil war began with muzzle-loading guns and ended with breech-loaders. Although the breech-loading gun had been invented long before the outbreak of the Civil war, it had not up to that time proved very practical and had not generally been adopted for military uses.

THE FOOD VALUE OF PINEAPPLE

As pineapple is being produced in large quantities in the Hawaiian Islands and is gaining a prominent place on the American bill of fare, it is attracting the attention of food specialists, scientists and doctors. In fact, it is greatly to the credit of our colleges and universities today that they maintain a department where the food value of any product is tested, and where the most careful experimental work is carried on with any food that the American people like to eat.

Such experiments have been performed on Hawaiian pineapple, and the following interesting figures have resulted:

Moisture, sugars, protein, crude fiber, mineral matter, and fruit acids in the order named are found in canned pineapple. Naturally the largest percentage of this juicy fruit is the moisture.

Since the vitamin content of any food is regarded of great importance in arriving at a judgment of its dietary value, various experiments on rats and guinea pigs are performed to determine this point.

These experiments have proved beyond question that the pineapple takes an unusually high rank as an all around source of vitamins,—this applies to both the canned pineapple and the fresh,—just after it has been picked at the right stage of ripeness.

Thus the American housewife is justified in her belief that canned pineapple is an article of diet of substantial food value and is not to be regarded as a luxury of pleasing flavor only!

LAURA WALWORTH, EDITOR

Articles of Interest In Current Periodicals

A sidelight on the character of dealers in illicit liquor is given in an illuminating story published in the Outlook for December 1, from which we quote:

"Not long since a young man came into the Outlook office and asked for a job. He seemed willing to accept almost any position from that of editor-in-chief up. He was questioned as to his present employment, and he replied quite frankly that he was the secretary of a prominent bootlegger. What he wished, it appeared, was a job somewhat more respectable, but one which would pay him equally well. We agreed with him that a position on the staff of the Outlook might fulfill the first of his conditions but we had to confess that we had no position open for him which would fulfill the second.

"It occurred to us, however, that he might possess some interesting material on the methods and manners of his profession. He seemed quite willing to talk and in an interview with a member of our editorial staff gave many interesting details as to the manner in which the funds of his employer were handled and the methods by which bribes were safely paid. The Outlook had no intention of publishing the reminiscences without checking them up through its own investigators. Enough, however, we soon learned from outside ources to show that the young man was, as he said, the secretary of a bootlegger, who made his home in a rather aristocratic club in an up-state city.

"At this point the investigation was stopped, for the young man had a sudden attack of conscience. He wrote us saying that even if the names were not given, he could not bring himself to violate the confidence of his employer. In another personal interview he enlarged at more length upon the generosity and kindness of the man for whom he worked. 'He has been,' he said, 'more like a father to me than an employer,' and he begged us to let the matter drop.

"Circumstances sometimes alter cases. The Outlook is just in receipt of a letter from this man, who we judge, is now the ex-secretary of a bootlegger. We quote briefly from his missive:

"How about the story? I could use my share of the profits now, as my friend has just been good enough to give me a worthless check for $800 in payment for one of mine."

The Outlook adds this comment: "It is a pity to have this young man's faith in human nature shattered. Possibly the situation is somewhat like that of the man who boasted frequently of the integrity and virtue of the gentleman who was supplying him with the choicest of whiskies. He kept on boasting of the virtues of his bootlegger until one day he got hold of a bottle containing more than its due share of wood alcohol. When friends called on him in the hospital he said rather plaintively, 'You know, I'm beginning to feel that maybe my bootlegger is dishonest.'

"The reader may supply whatever moral he wishes for this tale,"

In Current History for December are two articles on "Canada's Control of the Liquor Traffic," giving the points of view of those who favor it and those who consider it a failure. The latter is by Deets Pickett, research secretary of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is entitled "The Canadian System a Failure." In order to learn the facts relating to this subject the Board of Temperance sent a man to Canada to make a personal investigation in Quebec and Ontario. He also collected authentic information in regard to the other provinces having government control. In Quebec this investigator found vice rampant, much bootlegging and the finances of the province unfavorably affected by government control, and he quotes from business men and organizations to support his assertions. In conclusion Mr. Pickett says: "The Canadian people are naturally law abiding and the courts are demonstrating in a way which should serve as an example and a reproach to the United States. Nevertheless since government control of the liquor traffic has been in operation, official corruption in Canada has become a hideous pollution. The whole dominion has been shaken by the customs scandal and McLean's Magazine says: 'Behind the customs scandal—lurks the shadow of the liquor ring,' and charges that with its million the liquor oligarchy of bootleggers has summoned to its aid members of Parliament and has even been able to 'wrangle' defense from Cabinet members." It is Mr. Pickett's belief that "Government control in Canada has meant: Increased consumption of liquors; greatly increased use of alcoholic liquors by young men and women; a swollen liquor bill and social and economic losses which have halted prosperity; increased vice and crime; an illicit trade as great as that under any prohibition law and a corruption hitherto unknown in Canada."

Easterners Idea of The West

To those who live in the East, and have always lived there—who have a yearning to go West, but are held back because they retain the early mental pictures of a far-off region peopled by men who wear pistols in their belts and now and then "shoot up" a town, or because they want to stay where there are good schools for their children and cultured society for their wives—the West of today is a revelation.

It is difficult to convince many Westerners that the East still clings to the old picture of the West, as it is to convince the Easterners that their picture, so long cherished, is a caricature. Of course the East today knows a little more about the Far West than it did a few years ago. National newspapers and magazines and the railway companies have done a great deal toward altering the Eastern impression. It has attracted Easterners to the West, and those who came went back to their homes and became advertising agents for the Northwest. They carried on a great educational work.

But now, as concerning those who have never visited these parts and who have never even conversed with those who have been here. They think of us in terms of the "rainy season." For months, they think, the Puget Sound Country has a steady down pour. They do not know that the gentle, drizzling rains are looked forward to and welcomed by us in preference to clear, cold weather. The rains clear the atmosphere, purify it. They are health giving. We had three or four days of fairly cold weather this week. And it snowed a little. Nobody liked it—but the kids. Snow and ice are not natural elements in the Puget Sound country. Yes, it rains quite a bit during the winter months, but the rains are gentle, warm and intermittent We have many days that are bright and balmy.

The typical, average far Easterner does not know that in Western Washington there are many towns in which are to be found finer buildings, more modern architecture more beautiful parks and streets a broader culture a more vital civil spirit than are to be found in the great majority of towns of the same size in the older East. The public schools of Washington, in point of educational standards and efficiency, hold premier position among all the states of the Union.

Education here is within reach of every child in the State. There is the Agricultural College at Pullman and the State University at Seattle, ranking among the twelve foremost institutions of learning in America. There are normal schools high schools and common schools in which the most modern pedagogical methods are used, where the fine arts, domestic science and manual training are taught along with the regular studies—schools that have kept pace with the advance of education. Here we have everything that the East has—and more. We have a more wholesome environment, more wide open spaces and more year round verdant fields which impart a sense of freedom that is acknowledged by a full, deep breath, with shoulders thrown back; and, what is more—there are no false estimates, here.

Y. W. C. A. Meeting

The Y. W. C. A. in this district is celebrating its fourth year of progress and growth with an Annual Membership Meeting on January 29th. This is the one meeting of the year when Junior and Senior members come together for fellowship and to learn of the various activities that each of the many groups have been doing. This meeting is to be held in Hillsdale, at East Hall on the college campus with a luncheon at 1:00 p. m.

Michi Kawai, the General secretary of Japan has been secured for the speaker. Miss Kawai is just completing a year's study in Europe and America, studying particularly the rural and agricultural pursuits of these countries and is now preparing to take the results of her studies back to Japan. She has been much interested in the things our farm women have been doing. Miss Kawai is also much interested in world peace and the promotion of world fellowship among all women.

In addition to Miss Kawai there will be a number of local speakers on the program; people who are especially interested in the various activities of the Y. W. C. A. The North Adams Girl Reserves will furnish several musical numbers.

Two new Girl Reserve groups will be welcomed into the Association. These are the grade girl's group in Reading and the high school club of Addison.

The past four years have brought a growth in activities until now there are sixteen Girl Reserve groups, one business girl's club, two clubs of Young Employed girls and twelve Handicraft clubs.

Mrs. Addie Taylor is the Local representative on the County and district board. Mrs. L. D. Ford is the Chairman of the Handicraft class and Miss Genevieve Evens is the adviser for the Girl Reserve club. These women with a number of other women and the Girl Reserves will be in attendance at the meeting.

The reindeer industry in Alaska although a comparatively recent commercial undertaking, promises to become an important factor in the future development of the territory, says the Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture. The original stock of 1.280 animals imported to Alaska from Siberia about 25 years ago has increased to nearly 350,000 distributed in 110 herds. More than 1,000,000 pounds of reindeer meat was exported from Alaska during 1924 and 1925, and a steady increase in the output and demand is indicated. When properly produced and handled, the meat compares favorably with beef. It is fine grained, contains a good, palatable fat, and when fresh is exceptionally juicy and tender.

Hank Ford Buys 199 Tubs

The only man in this country who could swing such an enormous deal proved to be Henjy Ford of Deerborn, Michigan. The chairman of the shipping board scratched his right ear and said: "Well, well, where have I heard that name before. Let me see, Henry Ford; Ford—Ford, O I recollect! He's that Michigan chap who propaganded the peace ship; sure, that's the man, and by the way, he builds those little runabouts like I bought for my boy to play with. He likes ships. I'll sell him a few at most any old price."

And so 'twas done.

Hank got the ships. The Government got over a million dollars.

During the war a number of steel freighters and wooden boats were built at various shipyards but were never used because the armistice came too soon. Since that time the boats have floated idly at anchor in various ports—literally rotting and rusting to pieces. Of course it was necessary for Uncle Sam to police these boats and keep them under survey. Mr. Ford desired the steel and wood in these boats but the terrific expense of towing them from the seaboard to his River Rouge plant seemed an impossible barrier, but this was overruled. A million dollars more was required to build dockage and buy cranes to handle the job of dismantling. Now the work is going on regularly where about 275,000 tons of perfectly good "flivver" steel is being obtained. The timber goes into packing boxes and chips and scraps into a paper mill on the premises, and there is not a particle wasted. Henry finds miles and miles of copper piping, tons and tons of nails and hardware which is put in his stores. Thousands of brass fittings that have scarcely been scratched, are salvaged. Several acres of ground are set apart for the sterage of power-plants and boilers, and here may be seen rows of the finest marine engines of big proportions. They are the finest money could buy, and by means of 100 ton cranes are hoisted bodily from the holds and deposited on terra firma. Each engine tips the beam at approximately 73 tons, and as one would scarcely realize, Mr. Ford could not afford to furnish shelter for them, so they are coated with weather-proof and rust-proof paint.

Mr. Ford has five ocean-going tugs which take care of the towing when required. As the matter stands the government is well rid of the ships, and Henry can turn the materials back to the use of mankind. Our government is of course more or less open to criticism because of not selling this machinery as a unit at a good second hand price, but the builders said "no."

Farm Bureau Legislative News

State Legislature has recessed from January 20 until February 2 to allow the many legislative committees to visit the various state institutions to secure first hand information regarding their condition and financial needs.

Influenza Ravages

Authorities differ as to the first account of influenza, as well as to the identity of epidemics occurring before 1580. A severe epidemic in 412 B. C., described by Hippocrates and Livius, is thought to have been influenza. Authentic epidemics of the disease have occurred frequently since 1173.

The ancient republic of Venice was ruled for nearly 500 years by the Council of Ten, a secret tribunal which was instituted in 1310 and continued in power until the republic's fall in 1797.

Selection of Dairy Cattle Breeds Influenced by Shows

A good typical Ayrshire sire — Putting on the finishing touches

Many a man who is undecided as to the breed of dairy cattle that he will select has been influenced in making his decision by the animals of a particular breed that he has seen in public.

The individual breeder secures a great deal of advertising as the result of exhibiting at fairs, or in offering good animals at public sales. It gives people a chance to see and know the kind of stock that a man is breeding and paves the way for future business.

It is essential that special care and attention be given dairy animals far in advance of the time that they are to be exhibited or sold. Exhibiting or selling animals publicly in their every day clothes is poor advertising and puts them at a disadvantage when the competition is keen. It takes several weeks to put a dairy animal in good show condition and what applies to fitting for show applies as well to fitting for sale.

It is important that the dairy animal to be exhibited or sold be in good flesh. A good covering of flesh adds to size, increases smoothness and indicates that the animal is thrifty and in good health. Dairy animals being fitted need extra feed.

Stabling and blanketing are great aids in putting the hair and hide in condition. By stabling in summer, the animal is protected from the hot sun which makes the hide harsh and stiff to the touch. A roomy box stall that is kept clean and well bedded provides desirable quarters. Continuous blanketing helps keep the animal clean, sweats the hide, thus improving its handling qualities and makes the hair lay to the body. The blanket need not be expensive but it must be tied on securely.

Every dairy animal that is to be exhibited should have the hair clipped from the entire body about three weeks previous to the date of the show or sale. This will get rid of the old hair and allow a new, even growth to develop which will greatly improve the appearance and increase the selling value of the animal.

A point often overlooked in the preparation of a dairy animal for show or sale is that of training to lead and stand properly. An untrained animal cannot display its good points to advantage if it combats the efforts of the attendant to exhibit it properly. A little time spent each day in training to handle properly will save effort and embarrassment at the show or sale and increase the financial return.

While in the show or sale ring, the man in charge of an animal should have one main thought in mind, namely that of showing the animal to advantage. By this is meant that when it stands, its feet are properly placed, back straight and head alert. Any movement on the part of the attendant or animal should be as graceful as possible. Until the ribbons are placed or the auctioneer's hammer falls, take no chances.

Colonel E. H. Kerr, Sheriff

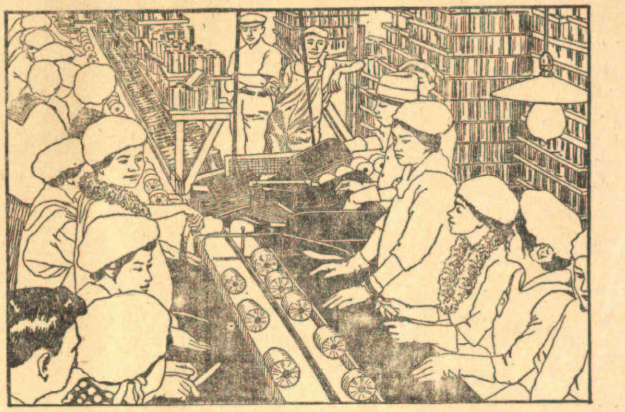
Every country, foresters believe should have one-third of its land area in forests in order to meet its timber and wood needs, says the Forest Service of the United States Department of Agriculture. Our country now has 138,000,000 acres of virgin forests, together with 250,000,000 acres of cut over land, or a total of only 388,000,000 acres that are valuable for timber production. This is only one fifth of our total land area. In addition to the wood used in buildings and other construction, thousands of articles, including even medicines and clothing, are made from trees or lumber. Furthermore, forests protect game and give enjoyment to hunters and vacationists. They also prevent the washing away of hillsides by heavy rains, and help to check floods by holding back the melting snow and rain water and allowing it drain off slowly.

Liquid foods including buttermilk, milk, cider and other fruit juices should not be allowed to stand for even a short time in a galvanized iron vessel, nor should such a utensil be employed in making preserves, jellies, etc. The zinc used in galvanizing will dissolve and give the food an unpleasant taste and may cause sudden and intense illness.

Hogs weighing between 180 and 230 pounds will ordinarily produce the best and most economical cuts of meat for family use. Hams and shoulders from such hogs will weigh 12 to 15 pounds, with loins and bacon strips at about 9 or 10 pounds. If the pig has been well fattened, not only will he produce more lard, but also the flavor of the meat will be improved. If the pig is given a 24-hour fast before slaughter, with plenty of water available, the carcass will drain more thoroughly and produce a better product.

Walnut King of Woods

Walnut appears to be the king in commercial hardwood lumber, measured by cost standards, says the Lumber Trade Journal. This aristocrat is the only species of wood used generally for lumber that costs more than at any other time in its history.



FROM PLANTATION TO TABLE

WHEN it's dinner time in these United States, it's generally lunch time in Honolulu. You go into your kitchen, and perhaps pour out the golden contents of a can of Hawaiian pineapple to give warmth and color to your winter dinner-table. Over in Hawaii, it's noon time out in the pineapple fields and hundreds of brown-skinned workers sit down in the sunshine to enjoy their lunch of fish and fruit. There is a warm languor in the tropical air, and now and then the slow strains of native song are heard. In every direction as far as the eye can see, big golden pineapples are lying in the fields, ripened under the liquid sunshine of Hawaii.

Just what happens to this Monarch of Fruits, from the moment it reigns on its throne of green spiked leaves, proudly wearing its crown, until it appears on your dinner table, still colored, however, with the magic touch of tropical sun, will be of interest in that it explains why our canned pineapple tastes as luscious as the fresh ripened fruits which the natives break on a rock and eat fresh from the fields.

From the moment it reaches the cannery to the time it comes out in the labeled can, the pineapple is handled in royal manner. It is not touched by human hands during the whole process of canning.

There is especially prepared for it a big sunny white laboratory, where everything is spotless, from the snowy white caps and aprons of the swarthy women workers to the gleaming white walls and tables of the cannery.

As the cylinder travels down the "line" via the endless belt route it passes before long rows of women workers wearing rubber gloves who remove any remaining "eyes" that the big machine has overlooked. The dark-skinned faces, as they review the pineapple parade make an interesting study. Perhaps it is the eternal sunshine of the Hawaiian Islands that has seeped into them, or perhaps it is the thought of the big lunch that they will have at noon—but at any rate the faces are happy ones, and their quick dark glances seem to denote eager interest in their work.

Now the pineapple is ready for the slicer. A machine receives the cylindrical fruit from another belt and slices it in symmetrical slices which do not vary a fraction of an inch. Another machine is busy at the same time digging out the luscious part of the fruit which remained inside the shell. This is the most delicious part of the pineapple as it has been nearest the sun. Later it will be labeled "crushed pineapple."

Pineapple is syruped in a very sanitary manner, but at a whirlwind speed. Eighty cans a minute revolve around the syruping machine, to receive their quota of rich heavy syrup, made from refined pineapple juice and pure cane sugar. This syrup is a big factor in making Hawaiian pineapple so delicious.

The cans of pineapple are then ready to go into the cooker. After that they go into the lacquer machine, which prevents rust, the dryer, and the cooler, which prevents further cooking.

This entire process has taken not more than 35 minutes. Every element of nutriment and every atom of delicious taste has been captured and preserved within that filled can of pineapple. Food inspectors who buy a sample can and have it chemically tested will find that it contains as much vitamin A as the ripe fruit, and that it is a rich source also of Vitamins B and C

Within thirty-six hours after the Pineapple Monarch reigned in the field, if you go down to the beach, where little Hawaiian boys dive around incoming boats for elusive pennies, and where the breakers foam on the coral reef, you can see great ship loads of these same pineapples packed in thousands of cases, ready to leave the land of plumy palms, oleanders, and gay hibiscus, to bring royal riches to tables of many lands.

BEGIN HOME FOR LONE CITY GIRL

Detroit Catholic League Will Welcome Workers of Every Faith in New Building

Ground for the new activities building of the Detroit branch of the League of Catholic Women was broken recently, in the presence of league members, prominent clergymen and representatives from various Catholic organizations of the city. The new building will accommodate about 150 women, and will be completed at a cost of $600,000 by next September.

Following the turning of the first sod, Bishop Mcihael J. Gallagher, D. D., who officiated, gave a short talk in which he declared that while the Catholic church in Detroit had obtained homes for orphans and the aged, as well as the House of the Good Shepherd for delinquent girls, it had failed until now to provide a home for girls out of work and open to the temptations of a large city.

"This occasion marks a period in our history that is of especial importance," he said. "This home, so generously contributed by our Catholic women, will not be a home for Catholic girls alone, but for girls of all creeds. Jewish and Protestant girls will be equally welcome. This home will be the center of women's activities and the pride of the Catholic women of Detroit in their accomplishment is entirely justifiable."

The new building, of brick and stone construction, is the outgrowth of the dream of an unknown donor who, 10 years ago, presented the League of Catholic Women with $10 as the beginning of a building fund. Since that time, thousands of dollars have been contributed and raised by parties and campaigns of various kinds. In addition to dormitories and executive offices, the home will contain a large auditorium, a cafeteria and an infirmary.

PIONEER NUN COMPLETES FIFTY YEARS OF SERVICE

Jubilee Exercises at Adrian Attended by Many Friends of Veteran Teacher

Fifty years in the service of Christian education were solemnly commemorated at St. Joseph's Academy, Adrian, recently, when Sister M. Hieronyme, O. S. D., observed her golden jubilee as a member of the Order of St. Dominic.

A native of the Bronx, Sister Hieronyme entered the order in New York City, in September, 1875, at the age of 16. At that time, the Rule of St. Dominic was observed in its ancient severity and the nuns were strictly cloistered. A few years later the work of teaching was taken up by the community, and Sister Hieronyme and her companions were sent to Bay City, Mich., where they endured all the privations of pioneer life.

Subsequently she labored in the Marquette diocese and in the archdiocese of Chicago, but her greatest work has been done in St. Joseph's school, Port Huron, where she has spent 25 years and where she is stationed at the present time.

The jubilee mass was celebrated by the Rev. Fr. M. Walsh, of Fenton, with the Rev. Fr. J. D. Walsh, O. P., Chicago, as deacon, and the Rev. Fr. D. Wynn, O. P., Chicago, as sub-deacon. The Rev. A. Philbin, chaplain of St. Joseph's Academy, acted as master of ceremonies. Present in the sanctuary were the Rev. Frs. F. W. McQueen and F. Schaeper, of Detroit; C. J. Meade, Chicago; J. Cotter, Williamston; J. McGuire, Aurora, Ill.; and F. A. Kilderry, Cary, Ill. The sermon was delivered by Father McQueen.

CONVENTUAL CHAPEL DEDICATED BY BISHOP

Capuchin Chapel Is Unique in Furnishings and Design

The conventual chapel of St. Bonaventure's Monastery on Mt. Elliott avenue, Detroit, which has been enlarged and completely re-decorated, was dedicated recently by Bishop Michael J. Gallagher, D. D.

This chapel of the Capuchin Fathers has long been a familiar spot to the faithful of Detroit and southern Michigan. While not a parochial edifice, thousands have visited it as the headquarters of the Third Order of St. Francis in the Detroit diocese. A striking feature of the chapel is the main altar, of beautifully carved wood, one of the few full-sized ornamented wood altars in the middle west. Flanking the main altar are two smaller altars, both of wood and both of medieval Gothic design.

In addition to the enlargements, which permit the seating of a considerably greater number of persons than in the past, the chapel has been lavishly decorated in oils, both on the ceiling and on the walls. The Very Rev. Benno Aichinger, O. M. Cap., who heads the Province of St. Joseph, is in charge of St. Bonaventure's Monastery.

STUDY CULTURE OF SCRUB OAKS

Investigation of the million acres of scrub oak land in the northern part of the Lower Peninsula of Michigan has been made during the past season by the forestry department of Michigan State college co-operating with the United States Forest Service.

"The object of the survey," says Prof. A. K. Chittenden, head of the college forestry department, "is to determine how fast scrub oak on this extensive area is growing, whether forest management would improve the growth and the practicability of converting these stands of oak into forests of more valuable species by natural or artificial means.

"The scrub oak type is generally considered to be of a temporary nature, but because there is probably a million acres included in this classification, it must be considered economically. Even though forest types are temporary in nature, the transition from one type to another is very slow.

"There are two types of oak land, the so-called oak hills and the oak of the outwash plains which has survived repeated fires."

FORD FACTORY IS CALLED SYMPHONY OF INDUSTRY

No one has written the symphony of industry. Yet it is the keynote of the world's existence today. Detroit is its initial source, whence flows the broad development of prosperity whose tones and rhthms are echoed by the walls of every home.

If two memorable and impressive pictures are taken from the plant of the Ford Motor company, none need object. Ford is a synonym for Detroit industry. The name has become a definition.

The first picture is of that wide gateway fronting John R. street which is nothing less than the door to another world. It is full wide, and behind it is mystery; things travel across the skyline on belts, whose source of power is hidden; an inner traffic moves busily on that guarded ground; chiefly there is a sense of great, skylit space within, commensurate with that broad entrance; it is a street set apart and a city within a city, into whose hgh walls stores have been set facing towards the world. You do not need the name to conjure with; it might be any factory, but that great gateway is a symbol of surperlative industry.

STATE FIGHTS PLAN FOR EQUALIZED COAL RATES

William W. Potter, attorney-general, has completed preparation of a brief setting forth the State's position in the lake cargo coal case, which is to be re-opened before the Interstate Commerce Commsision at Washington soon.

The case arises from the petition of the coal operators in the Pittsburgh district for the institution of a freight differential between coal shipped to the northwest and upper lake states from Pittsburgh and from the West Virginia and Kentucky field. At present the rates are approximately the same.

Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota North Dakota and Montana authorities are opposing the petition, because it would increase the cost of shipping coal to those states about 25 cents a ton and because it would leave the region to the mercies of one coal producing area.

U. S. GRANTS AUTHORITY FOR RAILROAD PURCHASE

Authority has been granted by the inter-state commerce commission to the Manistee and Northeastern Railway company to acquire and operate a line of railroad formerly operated by the Manistee and Northeastern Railroad company, running from Manistee to Traverse City, Michigan, about 71 miles, with branch lines constituting about 20 miles more.

The new company also obtained authority to issue $1,103,700 of common stock of the part value of $100 per share, in payment for the property to be acquired.

The old Manistee and Northeastern was sold at a receiver's sale in December, 1925, pursuant to a decree of the western federal district court of Michigan.

MICHIGAN SOON TO BE ABLE TO TALK WITH LONDON

Telephone communication between Michigan cities and London within a few weeks was predicted by the Michigan Bell Telephone company following the establishment of the new radio-phone commercial service between New York and London.

The price of the trans-ocean telephone service is $75 for three minutes, with $25 for each additional minute.

CO-ED'S BROTHER HELD BIG RISK IN CHAUFFEUR'S ROLE

The college co-ed may be addicted to many of the late models disapproved by the "older generation," but when it comes to the driving of an automobile, she is a better risk than her brother.

This is disclosed as a result of a questionnaire addressed by the American Automobile Association to 125 insurance and underwriting companies of America.

Practically all the insurance companies agree that the "female of the species" is a much safer risk than the "mere male." She doesn't take nearly as many chances and even "in the pinches" she appears to handle the car with better judgment than her strong armed brother. She does better also when it comes to avoiding emergencies. In fine, she is neither so reckless nor so careless as the boy and as a result, she is not caught in anything like as many damaging situations.

But what about the brother of Miss Co-ed: Well, the questionnaire shows him to be unquestionably possessed of a high content of recklessness in his complex. He is often very reckless; he is often a bad risk and in many cases the insurance companies shy clear of him entirely. Moreover, they believe that if they are compelled to insure him at random, as they would be under a compulsory liability insurance law, he would prove a drain on their treasuries.

TEMPER OPTIMISM IN 1927 PREDICTION

Reasons for tempering optimistic prediction as to 1927 with a fair amount of caution are not far to seek. As shown elsewhere, 1926 about equalled 1925, itself a record year, in most lines, while surpassing it in some instances; and these added or maintained gains over the earlier years that followed the 1920-21 depression, must be reckoned with as possibly modifying the prospect of a continued upward trend in the new year.

On the less favorable side of the picture of the future may be set the generally lessened return obtaind by agriculture, in values at least; the slowing down witnessed in building construction; the evidences of increased competition in the automobile trade, a big producer alike of tonnage value and of earning opportunity in preceding years; and the pretty general downward swing of prices of raw and manufactured materials covered by the Bradstreet price index that has brought the general price level down, except for seasonal summer declines, to about the lowest since 1924. Whether this latter decline is altogether ultimately unfavorable is open to argument, as there are those who believe that lowered prices in the long run expand consumption, though perhaps defering or cancelling profits of present holders.

As regards domestic demand, it may be said it is hard to set limits in this country to the earning power and spending ability of a people, large nothing as too expensive or luxurious numbers of whom apparently regard for every day purposes and use. It may be added that prophecy has gone astray too often in the recent past to encourage hard and fast prediction as to the course of business in the next 12 months, even the boldest prophets confining themselves to six months' forecasts.

With the trend of prices of many things in a downward direction, it would seem as if domestic, certainly foreign trade would be likely to go where price inducements, other things being equal, are most attractive. This if for no other reason, will probably justify, if not, indeed, enforce, in 1927, a continuance of the same studied steps in industry and the no less intense competition in trade distribution visible in the year just ended.

SURVEY SHOWS MANY OF STATE BIRDS BRAVE COLD

Despite the appeal of warm southern breezes and promised abundance of food, a large percentage of southern Michigan birds do not wing their way southward to spend the winter, a survey just made by the Jackson Audubon society shows.

Recently W. G. Fargo, Randall McCain, Harold F. Wing and Maurice B. Wing, members of the society, took a cross country trip to Munith, 15 miles northeast of Jackson, and counted 283 birds, comprising 22 species, during the journey.

According to their log, the temperature stood at 23 degress above zero when they started at 9 a. m., and was at 26 degrees on the return at 3:30 p. m.

CHICORY BRINGS RICHES TO ESTATE

If plants could talk, chickory would be a rebel against organized society. It has been misrepresented, maligned, libeled. Yet, far from being the villain it is commonly painted, it is a benefactor to man.

"Oh, yes, that cheap substitute for coffee!" you say

"Chickory. Why, that's an adulterant!"

"No chickory for me."

But do you know when you are drinking coffee mixed with chickory? Perhaps you have tasted, in hotels or restaurant, coffee with an aroma so exquisite and a color of such golden brown that it lingers in your memory still. Ahe you sure it contained no chickory?

The truth is that chickory, when added to coffee in small proportions improves its flavor and keeps it from going stale in a short time. This has been determined by scientists.

Anyone who lives in Michigan and speaks slightingly of chickory not only insults a virtuous vegetable; he darkens the fair name if his state for virtually all the chickory grown in the United States is produced in Michigan. It resembles the sugar beet and is grown under similar conditions.

The crop covers about 10,000 acres and an equal number of farmers include it in their system of rotation at one time or another. Its annual value is in the neighborhood of $700,000.

Chickory may be an outcast, but it is a flourishing one.

POSTOFFICE AT MEMPHIS SHOWS BIG BUSINESS GAIN

A remarkably rapid growth is shown in the postal business at Memphis in the last eight years, 34,000 money orders having been issued during that time. This is as many as were issued in the 70 preceding years.

The local postoffice was established in 1848, with Harry Rix as the first postmaster.

36,500 GOLFERS ARE ESTIMATED IN MICHIGAN

By conservative estimate, there are today 36,500 golfers in Michigan, 20,250 of whom are in the Detroit District. This does not include the women golfers, boys and girls classed as juniors, caddies, professional nor club employes.

A leading golf year book lists 149 Michigan clubs in its 1927 edition. Only 43 clubs are listed for the Detroit District. As a matter of fact there are 60 courses in the Detroit District.

In the State, outside the Detroit District, membership figures are given for 50 clubs. This total is 7,444 members, or an average of 149 for each club. With a total of 106 clubs in the State, the conclusion would be that the membership is approximately 15,788 outside Detroit.

If you know when to say "No," you will have no trouble deciding when to say "Yes."

FOX SQUIRRELS FACE EXTINCTION FROM FOE

Wright Park in Alma, Michigan, has long been noted for its fox squirrels. Hundreds of these bushy tailed rodents have made the park a point of interest to residents. But this is now being changed, for the red squirrels have invaded the domain, which means only one thing—good-bye to the fox squirrels. These two families, for some reason or the other, never get along and the result is always the same—the fox squirrels go if the red variety decide to stay. This is one of the mysteries of nature.

FISHING THROUGH ICE AND SPEARING HELD LEGAL

Lake St. Clair and the connecting waters are open to ice fishing and spearing under the general fish laws of the state. This reads that "any person may use not to exceed five lines with single hooks attached for the purpose of taking any kinds of fish except brook trout and bass thru the ice during the months of December, January, February and March, said lines to be termed ice lines."

During January and February it is lawful to use a spear in taking any fish except trout, black bass and walleyes.

The population of the world is increasing at the rate of five million a year.

FIGHT WAGED ON MAKING LAKE CITIES OF NATION SEAPORTS

When Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover, as chairman of the United States Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Commission, made public his report and recommendations on the project, he clearly pointed out the most important of all the public tasks confronting the people of Michigan and the whole Great Lakes region, at the present time.

This is the prompt development and mobilization of a powerful, unified and expressive public opinion to support the congressional representatives of the 16 states most interested in the St. Lawrence sea cut, in their effort to hasten action toward the materialization of this vital improvement.

Needless to say, the representatives of the states of the Middle West are unanimous in their eagerness to crystalize matters to this end, and they are jointed by representatives of several seaboard states, but the congressional representation of other states is uninterested, divided in opinion, or opposed.

Therefore a forceful expression of opinion by citizens of the Lakes states representing two-fifths of the nation's population, is a vital necessity if our long cherished hopes of "every lake port a seaport" is to be realized.

FORD TO PROVE WOOL PROFITABLE IN EAST

Henry Ford intends to prove that the sheep and wool industry can be carried on in New England as well as elsewhere.

He has purchased a large flock of pedigreed sheep which has has at the Wayside Inn at Sudbury, Mass. He has also purchased a herd of blooded Jersey cattle from a Connecticut breeder.

To keep the herds within bounds and to carry out his scheme of preserving old New England features, Ford has surrounded his fields with old-fashioned split rail fences.

UTILITY TAB SHOWS DETROIT GROWTH

Public utility statistics just compiled indicate that Detroit's population increased by more than 130,000 during 1926. A net gain of approximately 33,000 new meters in the Detroit district is recorded by the Detroit Edison company, and based upon the federal estimate of four to a family, the population inchease would exceed that total.

The net gain of services installed by the Detroit City Gas company is 25,113, with indications that the coming year will see the greatest growth yet recorded by the company.

These figures no not include families living in apartments where metering is included in the rent, and officials of both concerns state that the total of new subscribers in 1926 would be increased by several thousand more.

Another indication of the tremendous population increase during the last year is shown in statistics made public by the department of street railways, announcing aggregate gain in passengers carried on all branches of the department of 20,462,933. Under classification, these figures show that persons transported by street cars increased 4,004,623 during 1926, while those carried by the various coach services gained 16,485,309. The large increase revealed in coach passengers is due to the extension of bus lines, it is stated.

VARIETY IN SPORTS ON PROGRAM FOR ANN ARBOR IN 1927

University of Michigan has embarked on a program of expansion in varsity and intramural sports, which calls for completion within about a year, and which will satisfy the most ardent of alumni and student supporters.

First and foremost is the new million dollar stadium project, which is now well under way. Despite handicaps the work is ahead of schedule. Excavation practically is completed, and by April 1 the cement work will start. The financing problem has been solved with remarkable success. Of the bonds issued under the present financing plan, only 100 remain unsold, those in charge having disposed of all they wished to see within the past few months.

An instrumental building, with facilities for almost every imaginable sport, is soon to be erected on the site of the present north stand at Ferry field. Provision is being made for basketball courts, indoor baseball diamonds, handball, squash and tennis courts, wrestling and boxing rooms, and even a rifle range. The building probably will be ready for occupancy in furtherance of the four year compulsory physical education program for all students recommended by Dean Day in his recent report, which will be regularly enforced beginning next year.

The department of athletics is sponsoring an 18-hole golf course for students, to meet a long felt want.

HUNTERS MARVEL AT RABBIT INFLOW

Hunters, sportsmen and conservationists, while often classified under one head, are not identical in their aims and understanding of the group in which they are placed, but all at present are marveling at the inroads of the cotton tail rabbit in the swamps, meadows and cutover lands of the upper peninsula of Michigan.

Those who frequent the swamp land with scatter guns in search of the lumbering snow shoe rabbit are surprised when an occasional cotton tail bobs over the tract and disappears into a nearby burrow.

Hunters will have occasion to shoot with care after the end of January when they are out after rabbits, as the cotton tail in Michigan is protected after the last day of January, while his older cousin, the snow shoe, is without help until after February 15. To decide which is which, before shooting, is a simple problem. The snowshoe becomes white with the first snowfall, and holds this color until spring, while the smaller species do not change their coats.

The increasing number of cotton tails in the north woods is a natural trend of affairs, according to those who have witnessed the cut posts and frontier gradually pushed back by the expansion of industry. Small towns growing up and farms being cleared all assist in this change, which is becoming more apparent in the most distant hunting grounds. Just as the quail and prairie chicken follow after the more hardy partridge so the cotton tails follow in the wake of the jack and the snow shoe.

As land is cleared and swamps are replaced by meadows the snow shoe moves his feeding ground into deeper woods and thicker swamps, where his fodder is close at hand and safety is more assured. In the country he has reserted there is bountiful forage for the smaller cotton tail, which burrows in fields and finds the outlying farmyards an ideal place to nibble out an easy living.

The safest time to display courage is when the height, reach and chest measurements are in your favor.

TAXES ABSORBED FARM RENTALS

Taxes averaged 92 per cent of the net returns to owners of surveyed rented farms in seven northwestern counties of the lower peninsula of Michigan over a period of seven years —1919 to 1925.

The statement is based on returns from questionnaires sent to owners of rented farms in Emmet, Charlevoix, Antrim, Grand Traverse, Leelanau, Benzie, Wexford and Manistee counties.

Owners of the farms from which reports were received in these counties realized an average gross rent of $2.42 an acre during the seven years, but repairs, depreciation and operating expenses reduced the returns to $1 an acre, with a tax of 92 cents per acre still to be paid.

Taxes were highest and rents were highest in 1919. In that year from owners reported gross rents of $3.63 an acre, and a net return of $2 an acre before paying taxes. Taxes in 1919 averaged 75 cents an acre, or 38 per cent of the net rents.

The most unfavorable years were from 1920 to 1923, inclusive. In these years the farms reporting did not yield sufficient rent on the average to pay taxes.

NEW FORM OF IODINE FOUND IN SIX YEAR EXPERIMENTS

Search for an effective preparation for use in the control of worm infestation in animals, a matter of six years study and experimenting on the part of Dr. W. L. Chandler, research associate in bacteriology at Michigan State college, has resulted in a new form of iodine "iodine suspensoid," from which have been produced not only a vermicide and a disinfactant which meet the requirements, but also a surgical iodine which shortly will be placed on the market.

The iodine suspensoid which is the result of Dr. Chandler's study, is iodine in a very finely divided state, which remains in suspension in water. Since iodine is "free" and not bound by solvents as in the tincture form now on the market, the preparation is much more effective.

MONROE JOINS 10 COUNTIES IN FIGHT ON CORN BORES

With a view to combating the spread of the corn borer in Monroe county, a farmers' emergency committee has been organized, divided into four sections.

The sectional chairmen are: Burton S. Knapp, of Monroe; Fred Consear, of Ottawa Lake; Paul Clement, of Britton, and William Masson, of Newport. These chairmen will select a committeeman from each township who will give demonstrations in the township or district, showing the most economical method by which to clean up the corn fields and get rid of the corn borer. The committee is composed of 20 members.

This work will be done simultaneously in ten other counties in Michigan, which are infected by the corn borer.

FARMERS GO TO "SCHOOL" LONG AFTER GRADUATION

Farmers living in th vicinity of St. Johns, having distingushed themselves by completing a special course by dairying, given in the city high school by a Michigan State college professor, the first of its kind ever conducted in the state, started the new year by enrolling in the second course, animal husbandry, under the direction of Professor G. A. Brown, of State college.

The "school," which opened November 10, with the organization meeting in St. John High school, at which 50 or more farmers were present, is unique, and at M. S. C. is regarded as a milestone in the program of "continuing education," and expanding the influence of the college. Although others may follow, in small towns of Michigan, the St. Johns meetings alone are scheduled for the present college year.

30 MILLION STAKE IN FORD TAX SUIT

The nation's largest tax suit, involving more than $30,000,000 is under way in Detroit before three judges of the United States court of tax appeals. The suit is to obtain for the federal government the millions alleged to be due from the original stockholders of the Ford Motor company, as a result of the sale of their shares in 1919 to Henry Ford.

The suit was started by Andrew W. Mellon, secretary of the treasury, in March, 1925, when he asked more than $35,000,000 from the stockholders. This sum has been reduced $5,000,000 since that time.

Detroit has never witnessed such an array of legal talent as that to be employed in this suit. Many of the notable attorneys in the case, including John W. Davis, former candidate for president, have arrived and taken up quarters at the Hotel Statler. The defending council also includes Charles Evans Hughes, former justice of the supreme court and a standard bearer of the Republican party in 1916.

As a result of this suit people of the country will learn many of the details of the Ford Motor company, and the prenomenal development that made Henry Ford the wealthiest man in the world.

If the attorneys who are to appear in the case are reliable, then Wall Street, for many years puzzled as to "How Henry Did It" will also learn how this manufacturer, alone in the history of the country, was able to amass such a fortune without any aid from the Street! The gentlemen who lend money, and those who gamble in futures on the stock exchange, will be given great lessons in financing.

They will know when the trial has ended how Henry Ford was able to run $28,000, the original and only money ever invested in the Ford company to more than $1,000,000,000, in assets and how he has built up an organization that sells its products to every known part of the world.

STATE ROAD SYSTEM'S FATHER LEADS LIFE OF QUIET IN ALMA

In these days of good roads probably few persons ever stop to give through to the fact that the Michigan state highway department, which is responsible for the great improvement of Michigan's roads during the last decade, is less than a score of years old, an infant among the departments of the state.

To Townsend A. Ely of Alma, now 82 years old, must be given the credit for being the father of Michigan good roads, for it was Townsend A. Ely, as a state senator a score of years ago, who introduced the first bill to create a Michigan highway department, and who also introduced the first bill in the Michigan legislature requesting an appropriation "for wagon roads over the state."

And it was this same aged Alma resident, who 17 years ago became highway commissioner of Michigan.

Quiet and unassuming, Townsend A. Ely leads a retired life at his Alma home, retaining an interest in the state government, and a very deep interest in the growth and welfare of the Michigan highway department, and also in Michigan's roads.

More good judgment is needed in changing an opinion than in forming one.

LOOSE WAVING HAIR IS LATE HAIR STYLE

The tendency in smart coiffures today is toward large, simple effects, not stiff little curls or fuzziness. Big, loose waves arranged with the art that conceals art, are used in both long and short hair. This style of waving gives a more natural and becoming effect than can be produced by narrow regular undulations in the hair.

For the girl with high, broad forehead, a low side part is usually most becoming. The larger section of hair may be arranged in loose waves rippling diagonally from the parting across the temple to the cheek. The small section of hair may be waved close to the head. The lobe of each ear is permitted to show and long earrings may be used to give slenderness to the face. If this type of girl is a blue-eyed blonde with a well developed figure inclined to stockiness, her evening frock may be of black velvet in a straight, simple effect. She may wear sapphire earrings and a long necklace of the same. Her slippers may be also of black velvet with nude stockings.

The high side part is becoming to a slender face. If a right hand part is chosen, the larger left section of hair should be divided into an upper and lower layer. Put a large wave into the upper layer and curl the ends up in a long roll that is parallel with the parting. Put two waves in the lower piece of hair and curl the ends under leaving the lobe of the ear just visible. The upper layer falls over the center and the left side of the forehead. The right hand section of the hair may now be waved over the temple and ear on that side. If the eyes are blue, the skin fair and the hair a medium brown, turquoise blue taffeta will make a becoming party frock. A light cluster of small gold gauze flowerets may adorn one shoulder. Earrings and chocker necklace of turquoise will carry out the color scheme. Gold slippers and stockings will complete this symphony of blue and gold.

The youthful brown-eyed brunette with medium complexion and fairly large features may wear an almost straight coiffure. A triangular piece of hair on the top of the head may be divided from the rest and brushed diagonally forward over the forehead. Over the crown of the head and all down the back the hair is straight and sleek, but the ends of the front hair are loosely curled to give a fluffy effect on the brow. The side hair is brushed smoothly and two big waves are put into the lower part, over each ear. Old rose tulle combined with satin of the same shade makes a becoming evening dress for this type. If her figure is small, a bouffant effect may be used. A simple chocker necklace of rhinestones and a corsage of gardenias lend the right finishing touches to the costure. Slippers and stockings may be of silver.

The olive brunette, if her features are delicate and her skin smooth and youthful, may wear the straight page boy bob with a long bang over the forehead and no attempt at curling. The hair should be brushed until it is very sleek. No earrings are needed with this boyish coiffure.

The black velvet gown is quite as attractive and as useful as the black lace gown, although it is not as serviceable for traveling purposes since it requires more room for packing and must be steamed if creased. Lace can be packed in the smallest space without crushing and therefore is most serviceable for week-ends where the small overnight bag or small suitcase is one's luggage. Either black lace or velvet, however, answer the ever present question of what to wear for occasions when one is in doubt.

The vogue for Spanish fashions is reflected in an evening frock of black dotted net. It has a skirt composed of many ruffles, and placed on each hip is a large flat red velvet rose.

Most sophisticated and smart are dance frocks of black net heavily encrusted with crystals in intricate and charming designs.

At the moment claret colored shoes are must in evidence and almost invariably they are matched by the bag and by the flower which is an integral part of every day or evening costume.

For really cold days there are the new spats of wool, with fancy tops, to ward off chill winds. They are much smarter than the wool underhose that have been worn for several winters.

USED CRYSAL TO ADVISE REAL ESTATE BUYERS

The state securities commission had under advisement charges that Elizabeth Millard of Detroit, employed crystal gazing to aid her in selling real estate. Persons who alleged the woman sold them lots, after she professed to see piles of gold on them by gazing into the mysterious depths of a crystal asked that her license to sell real estate be revoked.

MICHIGAN WEEKLY WINS U. S. HONORS AS BEST NEWSPAPER

The Ionia County News, published by Fred D. Keister of Ionia, has four awards to its credit, carrying the distinction of being the best community weekly newspaper in the nation and state. Word was received recently that it had been given the national honors based on all around excellence. In this contest, which is conducted annually by the University of Illinois, several hundred newspapers were entered, representing forty states in the union, also Alaska and the Canadian Northwest.

The trophy, designated as the Benjamin Franklin award, is a copper plate, suitably inscribed and recognized among the fraternity as the highest award that can be conferred in the newspaper world.

The Ionia County News was founded by Keister in 1921, his idea being to offer a real old-fashioned country weekly.

MOOSE EATEN BY MAROONED GOBS

Sailors, working on one of the ships caught in the ice jam at the Soo recently, were getting tired of regular seaman's fare. The work was hard and they ate much. So when seamen lassoed a wild bull moose that burst out of the Canadian woods, opposite the Soo, and plunged into the icy waters to swim across the narrow channel, there was great rejoicing on one ship. The moose was brought in with heaving lines and before nightfall it had gone the way of all good moose when they fall into the hands of hungry woodsmen and sea workers. The antlers of the big animal are now on display in a local Soo store. They have a spread of about three feet over all.

LANSING PRO BALL TEAM CALLED RIPE FOR FORMING

Those interested in the future of the Michigan league have announced, within the past few days, that Lansing was ripe for a franchise in the state loop. Parties in Lansing who have sponsored organized base ball in the past and those best situated to undertake it again, fail to see where the organized game would be a success. Battle Creek and Lansing both have been talked as cities ready for league baseball.

Lack of an inclosed park and the fact that the last venture was a failure that drained the pockets of some of the most enthusiastic fans in the city work against the new project.

DETROIT WINS LAUREL WREATH

Poet laureates, too, have their troubles. What is one to do with the laurels?

"Use them for sauerkraut," suggests George Kemeny.

Mrs. Kemeny objects. She's rather inclined to keep them intact. "But they gather so much dust, and you cannot use a vacuum cleaner on them," she complains.

But then, the wreath of laurels is the gift from a whole nation in recognotion of Mr. Kemeny's literary achievements, so, on house cleaning days, Mr. Kennedy, who has ten children to help keep her busy, considers the laurels, ribbons et al, as part of the furniture and tapestries and happily cleans them all.

"But who is George Kemeny?" it will be asked. The question reflects more of the poet's troubles.

"To be the author of some 2,000 poems, and not to be known in your own state where you have lived and suffered many years, and where you have written all your poems, many in our own blood, is a real tragedy," Kemney remarks.

"To be exact, this is only one-half of the tragedy," he continued. 'The other half I sensed in Budapest, Hungary, last fall, when I was invited to take a chair in the Alexander Petofi society, Hungary's academy, so to speak. Over in Hungary, many of the young literati, poets and critics, also were asking one another, 'Who is this Kemeny?' Yes, this is a real tragedy."

The man regarded by many critics as Hungary's greatset living poet, is a Detroiter. He might have remained to the end of his days an unknown figure in Detroit—outside of the local Hungarian circles—had not the intellectual leaders of his native country decided to immortalize him by making him a member of the Hungarian academy.

M-23 IS TRIBUTE TO PRIEST'S VISION

Paying tribute to the man who fostered the first good roads movement in Michigan, who brought the first printing press and the first organ to the state, and who, through a priest, defeated General John R. Williams and Major John Biddle for the post of delegate to the United States congress in 1823, the proposal will be considered in the state legislature early this year that state highway M-23 be named after Father Gabriel Richard.

A hundred years ago Father Richard was the first to vision the need of highways if Michigan was to grow and to develop. Although as a delegate to congress he sponsored many other things, he made but one speech on the floor. This was an appeal for a highway. This speech of Father Richard's still stands in text and in wisdom as the eulogy of the good road.

M-23, the state highway recently completed, is the road Gabriel Richard planned. It follows the route he first suggested, and is opening to modern motor traffic just 100 years after the first work on the original right of way was commenced.

This roadway, just wide enough to permit wagon travel, was to penetrate a vast and little known wilderness, connect Detroit and Chicago, and open 17,000,000 acres of virgin territory to settlement.

A full century later, Michigan completed the last link of Trunk Highway M-23, a modern hard surfaced roadway, which faithfully follows the ancient route laid out in the pioneer days of the state by the surveyors of Governor Lewis Cass.

There is something of a difference between Michigan's $100,000,000 concrete highway system and the state of roads in the day of Father Richard, when he pleaded for an appropriation for the state's first highway. Father Richard pointed out the great importance of road building as an aid in the expansion of national government. He urged that the Detroit Chicago road be built immediately, while Michigan was still a territory, because it would open a new section to development and result in an increased sale of land, the proceeds from which would go into the national treasury.

In the great fire which destroyed Detroit on June 11, 1805, the little church over which he watched so carefully and which had been built by Father Bocque, a Franciscan missionary, in 1750, also was wiped out. While a new church was under construction he held services in the old Meldurm warehouse, situated near the bank of the river. The warehouse was used for six years, and then Father Richard removed to Springwells, to the house of Jacques Laselle, and remained there until the new Ste Anne church was so far completed as to accommodate his people. To show how universally loved and respected he was by his Protestant fellow citizens, in 1807 the governor of the territory invited him to preach to them in the English language.

FLINT GIRL SCORNS SPOILS OF THRONE

Found—a beauty contest winner who has no favorite beauty receipts and who doesn't care for such things, anyway.

She is Miss Julisko Lovas of Flint, Michigan, who has won the title of the pretiest Hungarian girl in this country.

Miss Lovas was crowned "Miss Magyar America" at a ball at the Seventy-first Regiment armory, New York City, New Year's Eve, after having been selected by popular vote.

Packing her trunks in New York, Miss Lovas said:

"The first prize entitles me to a trip to Europe—but's I'm going back to Flint."

Miss Lovas, who is nineteen, explained that she is manager of the office of a coal company "back home." No thoughts of the movies or other capitalization of the tribute paid her beauty, Miss Lovas explained, is on her mind.

BASKETEERS DANCE TO BRING GRACE AND AGILITY

Awkwardness on the basketball squad of Manistee high school has led Coach Andy Anderson to devise a new method in bringing gracefulness and agility to his players.

Aesthetic dancing, conducted on a strictly "boys only" basis, has been started by the Manistee high school mentor and his squad is now busily engaged in learning the latest steps propounded by the late Rudolph Valentino.

High school faculty members agree that it may eliminate some of the awkwardness from the squad but the players grunt with disgust.

A Tribute To Mother

Back of the glow of the setting sun where the evening shadows creep, there will ever linger a sweet memory. That in the twilight of life her hand in mine we have watched the shadows lengthen and clung together unto the peaceful night. Years fraught with suffering are closed. The journey of life ended and as softly as the sunbeam sinks into the folds of the flower, she fell asleep in God's care.

Helen Isabelle Murrey was born in Moscow, Hillsdale County Michigan November 6, 1841 where her early life and part of her married life were spent. She was united in marriage to Samuel Anderson Crowell in Saginaw Mich., where her new home was made and to this union one child Della M. Crowell was born to mourn the loss of a patient, loving, faithful devoted mother. In her hour of care, and in health she devoted time and labor to relatives, friends and neighbors in their hours of suffering need May 1st 1900 she became a resident of North Adams where the husband of her joys and sorrows passed away September 9, 1920.

January 21 1927 she passed to her reward be it small or great, ready and willing and pleading to be relieved of her suffering so hard to bear. Father, Mother, 3 sisters and two brothers had crossed the Great Divide, and she longed to meet them on the other side. One sister Mrs. Della Gillett, 3 nieces and 3 nephews and other relatives are left to deplore her passing to the Great Beyond.

Services were held at her late home Monday January 24 1927 and the sweetness of Rev. Wylie's message was a comfort in the hour of sorrow. The presence of Rev. and Mrs. Wylie at life's close gave courage to do my mother's will. The kindness and faithful service of relatives, neighbors and friends have helped me over life's weary way and the sweetness of the flowers of friendship gave of their cheer midst clouds of gloom.

Fare the well sweetest of life's blessings the way has been threaded, and across endless reaches I see Mother dear Mother waiting to give a glad welcome to me.

In loving gratitude
Della M. Crowell.

An electric waffle iron should never be greased. If your waffles stick perhaps you have not put enough melted butter or other shortening into the batter. One or two extra tablespoons of melted shortening in the batter will often prevent sticking. Also when the waffle is brown and crisp and ready to take out of the iron, thrust a fork firmly into it and lift the waffle straight up. If you work around the edges with a knife attempting to loosen it in that way, the waffle will break and be almost impossible to get out whole.

$1,000 IN REWARDS for Poultry Thieves!
The Michigan Business Farmer

Let's Drive the Poultry Thieves out of Michigan

Stealing chickens, ducks and turkeys from the farms of this State has proven so profitable that we are fighting an organized gang of bandits who use motor trucks to rush their spoils to city markets. It has got to stop.

The Michigan Business Farmer has set aside ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS ($1,000.00) to be paid in rewards to anyone, including state and county police officers, who secures the evidence and conviction of poultry thieves who steal chickens, ducks, turkeys or guinea fowl from its subscribers.

FIRST REWARD PAID

Frank Watkins, R. 2, Holly, Michigan, was paid the first reward under this offer. The thief he caught served 30 days in the Oakland county jail and paid $65 fine. Frank has $50 to show for ridding Michigan of one poultry thief.

Program committee Mrs. Jandy and Miss Owen.

L. J. Wilson of Greenville got himself into a fix the other day by shooting a chicken thief in Wilson's own door yard. The thief proved to be a citizen of his own town, and died at the hospital a short time after. Now the Judge and officials want to hold Wilson for man slaughter which the farming population and organizations of the state object to pretty strenuously. Petitions are being circulated all through this country for signers requesting the Court to excuse Wilson. What will be done we do not know. We do know that finding a gentlemen in your chicken roost in the wee sma' hours is very annoying and the habit of most people if they have a gun is to shoot such pimps. It is claimed by the Michigan Business Farmer that Wilson gave the thief ample time to halt and save his skin which he failed to do. Under the circumstances we should challenge any Judge on God's earth to produce a jury that would convict Wilson. Judge Hawley of Ionia probably wants to uphold the dignity of the law as should any Judge, but we wish him success which we know he won't have. Even a jury of Igorrottes would not convict a man for protecting his own interests.

Thank You

We thank all who have paid their subscription on this paper. A few more subscriptions are still unpaid, and we hope this will be attended to at once. This is a matter which needs settling

U. S. BEAUTY SPOT IN NORTH MICHIGAN

Up in Alger county, in the northern peninsula of Michigan, there are approximately 25,000 acres of virgin timberland covering an area which takes in some of the wildest and most picturesque scenery in the middle west, which residents of Munising for the last two years have been trying to get the state to take over and convert into a state park, in an effort to preserve this unspoiled bit of old Michigan for the enjoyment of tourists and coming generations.

It is a vast region of rolling hills, untouched forests and tumbling streams and waterfalls that Alger county conservationists are seeking to preserve and there is every indication that favorable action will be taken on the state-park proposition.

An investigation of the proposed area was made some time ago by M. D. Hoffmaster, superintendent of state parks, who accompanied several Munising men through the forests that overlook Lake Superior from the top of Pictured Rocks..

The most beautiful scenery in Michigan, if not in the entire middle west, is included in the proposed park region. Pictured Rocks, which are towering bluffs of sandstone, fantastically colored by erosion and mineral ores, comprise the entire northern boundry. At intervals along this line of cliffs, streams gush over the rocks, and sink into Lake Superior in a mist of spray and foam.

The virgin forests extend sheer to the water's edge imparting an air of wildness to this north rim of the park area. Distinctive rock formations, including sail rock which from a distance, resembles a sloop with gib and mainsail spread, grand portal, which is a huge cavern with vaulted passages, and Miner's Castle overlooking the lake with the appearance of a medieval palace, are striking features of the coast line.

The proposed park region is from one to three miles in depth from Superior, and may include Miner's Falls, where the river drops a sheer 70 feet into a fog-cloaked chasm. A trail has been built to this water fall, which previous to last summer, was rarely viewed by human eyes. Another road to Miner's Castle to make accessible to the visiting tourist this most noted feature of the north country, is now under construction and will be finished by spring.

TURNS DESERT OF SAND TO FLOWERBED AND REAPS DOLLARS

Out in the sand hills of Western Michigan, where sterile soil has spelled tregedy to hundreds of families, a retired Chicago businessman is growing flowers for the metropolitan markets. A hobby of a dozen years ago has developed into a large industry, bringing him success in a region with a record for agricultural failures.

Corn or even weeds wouldn't grow on E. B. Eddy's 50-acre farm when he went to Grand Junction 12 years ago. Now he proudly displays orange trees with yellow fruit and lemons ripening under green leaves. His farm is an oasis in the barren sandlands—made so by glass, modern greenhouse methods, a little luck, hard work and perseverance.

Mr. Eddy came to the sand hill country in search of health, following a nervous breakdown. He had always been a poultry and flower fancier. Forced to abandon urban life, he turned for subsistence to what had only been a pastime.

Fortune at first was almost as unkind as nature. Illness the first year compelled Mr. Eddy to return to his friends the $20,000 they subscribed for the poultry establishment he was to conduct.

SECRET OF INDIAN'S GRAVE IS SEALED BY LIFE SENTENCE

In the cut over timber land of Blue Lake township is a single Indian grave whoch has been given care for many years and is marked by a wooden cross.

The fence and wooden cross over the grave were erected by Asa K. Bartlett, who is serving a life sentence in the Michigan Branch Prison at Marquette. Bartlett confessed to mailing a bomb to August Kruebaech, Blue Lake township supervisor and political enemy. The bomb took the life of Mr. Kruebaech; also his daughter, Janette and her fiance.

Just why Bartlett showed special attention to this grave he never revealed. He used to spend much of his time roaming about the cut over timber land near the grave of the Indian.

Asbestos suits and special chemicals are the equipment of the modern fire-fighter when he tries to extinguish an oil blaze.

SHADOW OF MORAL'S GREAT DIAMOND SQUAD REPORTS FOR PRACTICE

Only a shadow of the great Western Normal base ball team of last year began practice in the gymnasium in preparation for the season of 1927. Of the infield of 1926, only Captain Schrumpf remains. The great trio, Covington, Yost and Righter, are gone, the two latter by the graduation route and Covy because he went into pro base ball last summer. Nestor is the sole survivor in the outfield.

Assistant Coach Charles Maher, who will be in charge of the team until Herbert Buck Read gets through with the basket ball season, will have to build up almost entirely a green team in all departments but one—the battery.

Although Keinbaum and Ruse are gone from a great galaxy of pitchers, there is enough material left to satisfy the coach. There is Kimball, the high school sensation at Ionia two years ago; San Beauchamp, the righthander who set a new strikeout record a year ago when he whiffed 16 men at Lake Forest in a nine-inning game, and Bob Hagen, the Upper Peninsula star, who was considered by many the ace of the squad last year.

ANN ARBOR SEEKS ROOM HOUSE DOOM

In an age of change, it's unsafe to assume that anything—except the miraculous brook reported by Mr. Tennyson—goes on "forever."

If ever there were an Ann Arbor institution apparently founded upon the rock, it was the typical Ann Arbor rooming house and, of course, the Ann Arbor landlady. But the clock has struck, the bell has rung and shortly, if University plans mature, the rooming house will live only in the memory of those alumni who spent their undergraduate days outside the sacred circle of the fraternities.

A comprehensive survey, just concluded by a faculty committee, finds the lot of the non-fraternity man leaving much to be desired. Poor housing facilities, it is alleged, are conducive to physical softness, intellectual sloth and, sometimes, moral weakness. For the majority the rooming house should go, the investigators say, and in its place should rise a series of beautifully appointed dormitories, ably administered, each with its library, lounge or socfial gathering place. Each should be a compact closely organized unit and each identified with some particular school or college of the University. The scheme is an implied recognition of the fact that present haphazard housing is inadvisable for an institution of 12,000 students and it recognizes the merits of some such system followed for generations at English universities.

Of course, this is merely a suggested solution to the problem. There are many difficulties in the way of its immediate execution. It seems at present unlikely that legislative appropriations can be obtained for the purpose. Sites in the neighborhood of the campus are almost prohibitive in price. And unless some allumnus or industrial Alladin with magic, wealth-producing lamp appears, the project mupst be deferred, though not abandoned. A start has been made in the existing dormitories for women and in the Lawyer's Club for men.

What's wrong with the old-time rooming house, with its creaking stairs its dingy and spotted carpets, scarred and ink spattered desks, its "golden oak" rockers and its (one time) white enameled double deck bunks? What's wrong with the dingy rooms, reeking of pipe smoke from past generations of students, scenes of many a long night's attempt to settle the world's affairs—or many a longer night's session with half a dozen gentlemen in bathrobes and eye shades absorbing an education in "stud" or "draw" or the more chromatic "Red Dog" and "Black Jack?" And what's wrong with Her Implacable Highness, the landlady—usually a "widow woman," usually with a nose red tipped in winter, usually subsisting, to judge from the "odeur de maison," on boiled cabbage, creamed couliflower and onion soup?

Ay, what's wrong?

Why if it weren't for what happened at sundry rooming houses between 1850 and 1926, what, one may ask, would furnish the Old Grads with conversation at reunion time. They have drifted far enough apart, Heaven knows, and it's the only common experience left them.

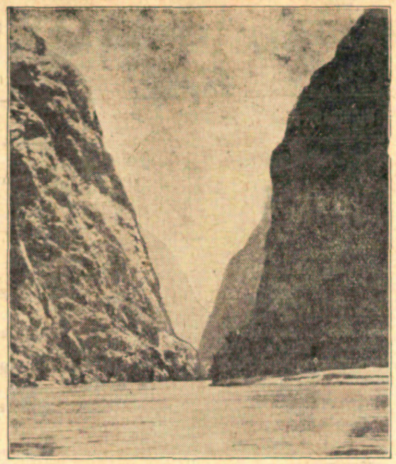
BOULDER DAM TO BE WORLD'S LARGEST



Boulder Canyon on the Colorado River, where the Federal Government plans the construction of a gigantic flood control and water storage dam to be financed from the sale of hydro-power it will make available.—Southwest News Photo.

Adoption by Congress of legislation that has been favorably reported out by committees in both Houses will authorize the construction of the world's largest dam at Boulder Canyon on the Colorado River, dispatches from Washington point out.

Boulder Dam, as planned by engineers in the United States Reclamation Service and approved by Secretary of the Interior Hubert Work, will be 550 feet high—more than twice as high as the highest dam now in existence.

Planned primarily to protect California and Arizona territory against devastating Colorado River floods, Boulder Dam, in addition, will create a site for the development of 1,000,000 horsepower of hydro-electric power.

This colossal dam will create an artificial lake 80 miles long and 30 miles wide in the midst of the Great American Desert. Water from the reservoir will be available for domestic use by a large number of cities in Southern California, now launching an aqueduct to bring them water from the Colorado River.

Boulder Dam, according to legislation now pending in Congress, is to be self-financed and pre-financed. The Swing-Johnson bill provides that the Government is not to make any expenditures on the dam until the Secretary of the Interior secures sufficient contracts for power and water from the dam to repay the Government, with interest, all money spent in the construction and maintenance of the structure.

More than fifteen billion dollars in new industrial and agricultural wealth will be created by the electric power and water from Boulder Dam within ten years after its completion, it has been estimated by Government surveys. This new wealth will return, from the Southwest, more than $100,000,000 annually in additional taxes to the Federal Government, it has been pointed out.

Situated 150 miles south and west of the Grand Canyon, the site of Boulder Dam is in that section of the Colorado River which forms the boundary line between Nevada and Arizona.

BUSHEL IS LIFTED OFF ANTRIM LIGHT

Chambers of Commerce are common enough in cities and even in villages with the "let's go' spirit, but the larger unit of the county seldom finds it possible to weld its dfferent communities together for anything except politics and agriculture.

Antrim County, in the Grand Traverse region, however, has achieved the unusual. It has no big cities. Its largest, Mancelona, musters only 2000 inhabitants. Central Lake has about 800, and Elk Rapids and Bellaire about 600 or 700 each. With the practical disappearance of the lumbering industry Antrim found itself in the position of many a Michigan county—almost bankrupt.

Antrm, though unlike some timber counties, refused to say she was through when the last logs were floated down her streams. For many years this northern land—some of it inaccessible during the winter months—has produced more than one-half the radish seeds grown by the entire United States.

Its seed potatoes are famous. Of certified potato seed this county produces one-third of the whole state yield. Since seed potatoes average in price 50 cents a bushel more than table stock and produce some 50 more bushel to an acre than ordinary seed it can readily be seen that the county is poor no longer.

But Antrim is not content. It has now organized a Chamber of Commerce to "sell" the county as a whole to the world. Its already established resort business on Torch Lake and its 65-mile chain of smaller lakes and streams gives it the nucleus of a public to which it can appeal without preliminary introductions.

Antrim has a rich and colorful background in the Indian legends clinging to many of its most beautiful lakes and streams, and plans are being considered for the portrayal in pagentry of the drama of the Indian, the pioneer settlements, the rise and fall of the lumber industry, the battle over the county seat, the settlement and development of its communities and its emergence after many reverses as a seed raising area which competes with California alone.

DOG TEAMS CARRY MAIL OVER LAKE ICE TO MACKINAC ISLAND

Ice conditions for operating the great railway car ferry, Chief Wawatam, now the only ship operating on the Straits of Mackinac, are the best they have been in a long time.

When the shifting ice crowded into the narrow passage it piled up about 20 feet thick on Graham shoals and undoubtedly will remain there until spring. No open water is to be seen in the vicinity of the Straits and the steamer Elva of the Arnold line, which maintained service between St. Ignace and Mackinac Island during the fall and early winter, has ben laid up at St. Ignace for the balance of the winter. The mail is now being carried to Mackinac by dog teams and sleighs.

Plans are being made for the showing of colored slow-motion pictures of surgical operations in medical colleges.

PEN ARCTIC OWL IN DETROIT YARD

William Stelt of Detroit, a former police officer, is entertaining a strange guest in his back yard. The guest is immured in a small pen, from which it attempts to escape by beating its heavy wings against the encompassing wire, and finding this to no avail it sulks in the corner, a big ball of whitish feathers, with two yellow eyes blazing resentment at the onlooker, and its beak cracking together in tones of anger. The guest is an Arctic owl.

The Arctic or snowy owl, scourge of the ptarmigan, wild ducks and the hares that live within the Arctic circle, has invaded Michigan and the northern tier of states this winter in large numbers. A scarcity of food has driven them from their northern homes. The newcomers have been taken all over Michigan and frequently can be seen sailing with ghostlike winks over the snowy landscape, or following the icy beds of creeks and small rivers, since they are accomplished fishermen as well as hunters. Stelt's owl, however, is the first that has been captured in the Detroit area.

A short time ago Stelt and his two sons, George, 15 years old, and William, 12 years old, were hunting rabbits in a field six miles from Mt. Clemens. The youngest boy saw a big white bird bearing downu upon them from a clump of trees, a bird that flew with uncanny swiftness for one with a five foot wing spread. "Look at the heron," he said to his father.

Stelt took a long shot at the bird and brought it down with a broken wing. After a struggle in which his gloves were torn by its talons, he succeeded in placing it in a burlap sack, and transported it to his home, where it was placed in the pen. It was quickly identified as an Arctic owl.

The owl has adapted itself very well to its new environment and is again able to fly, for the wound, but a slight one, has healed. It will eat field mice or rats with avidity, killing them with a quick stroke of the lethal talons, and swallowing them whole. It will also eat sparrows, providing they are skinned and stuffed into its big mouth. But it will not touch raw meat. Selt says that the problem of feeding the owl is one that is causing him a great deal of trouble, and that he will present the captive to the Bell Isle aviary.

SUIT ON 25-YEAR-OLD NOTE IS THROWN OUT SPENT IN JAIL SUES

When on effort is made in 25 years to collect a note, the holder of the note has no recourse in law. This, in effect is the ruling of Judge J. H. Colline in circuit court, in dismissing a suit brought by Miss Mae Osburn, of Perry, aganst H. S. Dunning of the same place. She sued, as administratrix of the estate of her father, to collect on a note for $500 given her father in 1901 by Dunning.

ADVISES OF CARE IN SHIPPING STOCK

"Dead animals are not worth much. Get your livestock to destination alive."

This advice is headlined on the first chart prepared for distribution by the Michigan Livestock Loss Prevention Association, organized in Lansing several months ago. Copies of the chart, according to E. J. Leenhouts, the secretary, will be hung in vocational high schools, offices of county agricultural agents, Grange halls, offices of shipping associations and banks.

"Our association is now completely organized and has funds to proceed with the work outlined at previous meetings," he said. "We will soon be ready to distribute some other literature and posters on the subject of livestock losses."

The chart gives suggestions for the handling of livestock during the various months, a table showing the percentage of deaths due to overcrowding of cars, illustrations showing the lack of lung development in fat hogs and considerable miscellaneous advice on the care of livestock.

"Do not drive fat hogs on foot," says the chart, "even though the distance is short; the slower ones will try to keep up with the faster ones and become exhausted.

"Hogs should never be fed immediately before or after being placed in the car. This s especially dangerous in hot weather. A full stomach will limit breathing space in the lungs by pressure on the diaphragm. Normally hogs lie and rest while their food digests, but in transportation they are nervous and restless and are likely to suffer from indigestion.

"Hogs ride best on sand or similar bedding in hot weather. Cars should always be reasonably clean. Cattle keep their footing best when sand or other grit is used to prevent slippery floors.

"Did you ever stop to think when you strike a market animal with a club, stick or whip you are bruising it so that part of it is unfit for food and must be condemned?" the chart asks. "This loss on account of bruises runs into millions of dollars annually."

DEAF AND DUMB TAUGHT TO TALK

The teacher spoke with painstaking care. Her little pupil figets as all little girls do, and smiled winningly at her.

"Run to the window," the teacher said, slowly, distinctly, her lips carefully forming the sounds.

The little girl ran to the window, stepping upon a window box and then touching the pane before she returned to the low chair upon which the teacher sat.

"Skip to the desk."

"Show me the little boy."

"Jump to the man."

Little Mary, smiling at the fun she was having with her lessons, obeyed returned, twisted about and threw her arms about the teacher's neck.

The teacher rose from her chair and seated herself at the piano. Slowly, distinctly, she gave directions to the tiny tot who placed her hand on the instrument. The teacher sounded three heavy chords and two light ones. The child "listened" with her hands, and when the teacher tapped her on the shoulder ran to the black board and with chalk marked three long, heavy lines under the word "strong" and two thin, short lines under the word "weak." The girl's had waved from her shoulder in perfect time, and when the time was changed her little hand followed, her sparkling eyes half shut as she hugged close to the piano.

Little Mary is deaf. She was born deaf, and when, last September, she entered the Detroit Day school for the Deaf she was unable to hear or to speak. At five years she can do many of the things that normal five-year-old girls are doing, shutting the door when she is told, obeying simple orders and best of all, this little tot, who by an unkind fate was born into a silent world and into one in which she made no sound, can make the simple sounds that babies make.

All this is the result of painstaking and well planned effort on the part of highly trained teachers who devote their lives to the instruction of the deaf. The children are taught to make the sounds which form words through noting the enunciation of the teacher. Consonant sounds are demonstrated by having the pupils imitate the vibrations produced. Some times their hands are placed before their mouths, sometimes upon the cheeks and on the throat, and after the teacher demonstrates the manner in which the sounds should be made the children reproduce them by reproducing the vibrations of the voice.

ANN ARBOR FIXES ATHLETIC BUDCET

Michigan's athletic expenditures now are on a budget basis, Professor Ralph W. Aiger, chairman of the board in control of athletics, University of Michigan, said in his annual report to the university senate. The latter body passes the report on to the board of regents as the annual report of athletics for the year.

Michigan's budget, beginning with the fiscal year, July 1, 1927, will be $315,000, Professor Aiger's report said , this including, in addition to the funds for the support of sports and physical exercise, an item of $80,000 in payment of interest on the stadium bond issue.

The budget items are:

General—$30,000.
Football—$37,000.
Baseball—$16,000.
Track—$20,000.
Basketball—$14,000.
Specials (hocky, tennis, golf and wrestling, etc.,—$20,000.
Programs, etc.—$25,000.
Colliseum—$3,000.
Maintenance—$40,000.
Interest and retirement—$80,000.
Contingent fund—$30,000.

"The sums awarded to the various items in this budget are based largely upon the figures of the last two college years, but taking into account that with the enlarged plant and program there would have to be increases in some respects, says the report.

Football is the only self-sustaining sport at Michigan, Professor Aiger explained in presenting his figures, stating that if basketball were apportioned that part of the moneys due froms the sale of coupon books it would at least break even.

Football earnings for the last season were $216.698.11, the report stated, this being the Michigan share from totals receipts of $488,618.45.

HOLLAND MAN MAKES BED IN BEAR'S HOME, ROUTED, KILLS BRAIN

Dr. Willis Geerlings, of Holland, will never try to spend a night in a bear's home even if he is lost in the northern woods. One experience is sufficient after an argument with a 220-pound bear.

Dr. Greelings was on a deer hunting trip in the Upper Peninsula and became lost in a swamp at twlight. He picked out a hollow log and decided to enlarge the opening and there spend the night. Hearing a noise, he turned and saw a black bear. He fired and toppled the bear, which jumped and ran. Meantime, Dr. Greelings' brother, who was searching for him, arrived. By lantern light the two tracked and found the bear, which showed fight before it was killed.

THESE COPS HAVE HARDEST OF JOBS

How does a woman take bad news? Minute men of the Detroit police department know, for much of their work has been delivering messages of wee.

There are six Minute Men at each police station. They work in pairs, each pair on an eight-hour shift. They are emergency men and one emergency that kept them busy was calling at homes with the news that some member of the family had been killed or injured, or was in some sort of trouble. Calls on the police department to deliver bad news became so frequent that Commissioner William P. Rutledge has been forced to curtail the service. He found that the time of the policemen was being wasted on many trivial errands. But in lessening the work he has not lightened it, for the Minute Men will continue to carry the really serious messages and the really serious messages and the eight hour shifts will still be filled with sobs, fainting women, pathos—and some humor.

"Every woman acts differently," one replied. "Some faint. Others laugh hysterically. One, the other day, after being notified her husband was dead, said, 'Now I wonder where that man left his life insurance policy?'

"In many cases, when an officer appears at a private home, the woman who comes to the door denies she knows the party mentioned. It is necessary to come out bluntly with the bald facts in the case before they admit their identity. This makes it difficult to break the news gently and in fact no attempt is made to do so in some districts."

Injured husbands, if they might follow the Minute Men to the home when the sad tidings are spread, would probably lose conceit by the bucketful, declare the breakers of bad news.

APPLE GROWERS OF STATE PLANNING TO PACK IN BOXES

Independent and co-operative shippers of apples in Michigan are giving serious consideration to adopting a different type of package to compete with the growing competition from western boxed apples. It was indicated at a recent conference in Grand Rapids that some of the leading shippers will pack part of their 1927 output in boxes, instead of baskets and barrels.

"Western apples must have something besides looks to make them sell so well and at such high prices in competition with our fruit," said J. A. Fruit Exchange, one of the largest co-operative fruit associations in Western Michigan.

Barron was inclined to believe this difference was chiefly in the pack and package, and indicated his company was strongly considering the use of a box pack for its fancy apples this year.

SPARTANS PLAN TRIP TO DIXIELAND IN MARCH

Michigan state college base ball team will spend a 10-day training period in the southern states during the latter part of March. The board of control of athletics approves the proposal to send the Spartans into Dixie for a second campaign.

The trip a year ago resulted in the team coming back in playing form and a good share of its success is attributed to the spring drills down in the south.

HOUSE OF BIRTH CLOSED BY DEATH

Death finally has closed the ancient house that stands at 1004 Congress street east, Detroit.

It may properly be called an ancient house, for in this mad Middle West, where towers rear over the sites of our grandparents' truck gardens, a house that has lived 100 years becomes a relic, a token of an earlier civilization.

This house was built about 1826 of materials hauled by sled from Mt. Clemens. It stood on the very hem of Detroit's homespun petticoat, on a street quite new.

It has witnessed the influx of the aristocrats. It has seen the time when the Chapatons, the Vigers, the Rabauts, the Frasers, the Gillets lived in Congress street and its was a gay avenue lined with trees and wrought iron hitching posts. It has watched the inevitable exodus, too, before the heartless invasion of trade and commerce.

Now there are no trees left in that early portion of Congress street. Only the winking of traffic lights and the hum of heavy vehicles. And the old house, too, will pass.

A century ago, William Flattery, a young Irishman from Limerick, who had come into the "West" to make his fortune, fell in love with Johanna Walsh and married her. They bought this house, then new, in Congress street. Three children were born to them, two boys and a girl.

When Emma Flattery, their daughter, married James Keith, the ceremony took place in the house and the newly married couple returned from their honeymoon to live there with the bride's parents.

Thus Mrs. Emma Keith was born, married and—January 14—died in this ancient house. She was 78 years old. Until six months ago, she kept it without assistance for her brother and herself. He, who is now 72 years old, lies prostrated at her death and the members of the family fear for his life.

STATE PUZZLED BY LAKE LEVEL LAND

The decision of the supreme court authorizing the lease of land in St. Clair flats and all other state land uncovered by the dropping of the lake level, is arousing much discussion among sportsmen, property lessees and navigators.

The decision specifically exempted land fit for "hunting, fishing or navigation," and apparently leaves the decision to the state conservation commission as to whether the land is fit for such purposes.

It appears, from this decision, that the "steal" which Chicago is making of Great Lakes water to carry on its sewage, stands to make Michigan rich from leases, in the opinion of some. Thus the "sin of Chicago" may be offset by a lower tax ratein Michigan.

However, if the United States assets itself and stops Chicago's violation of the treaty rights of Canada and the basic rights of the other lake cities, there may be a rapid rise in the lake level and all these lands may again be covered by water.

Then would arise the nice legal point as to what the state of Michigan would be supposed to do. Would it have to bulkhead the lands leased so as to save the homes built on the reflooding land, would it have to establish a flotilla of pumping boats to maintain its lease bargain, or could it rest secure on the old legal claim of "an act of God."

The flood sufferers in this case could point out, quite logically, that not God, but the government, was causing the flood to rise, and Michigan then might be in the peculiar position of being compelled to get down on its knees to Chicago and ask that sinful city to take even more water for its drainage canal.

There are a lot of possibilities in the situation, but one of the few certainties, in the opinion of wielders of the festive rod and reel, shotgun and rifle, and rudder and main sheet, is that civilization, in the shape of the supreme court, is daily encroaching more and more upon the happy hunting, fishing and sailing grounds of the state.

GIRL CLEARED OF THEFT AFTER YEAR

One hundred thousand dollars is claimed by Miss Charlotte Enyder, a former Detroit bookkeeper and cashier, who was brought from Hollywood, Cal., to face a charge of embezzling $3000, kept in the county jail for a year and subsequently acquitted in Detroit Recorder's court, according to suit filed by her.

The defendant is Moses E. Tremaine, head of the Tietze Cleaning and Drying company. She accuses him of malicious prosecution and illegal arrest.

ALFALFA GROWTH URGED IN FIGHT ON CORN BORER

Fight the invasion of the corn borer by raising alfalfa and sweet clover is the advice of W. C. Cribbs, extension expert of Michigan State College.

Mr. Cribbs is now in Traverse City to direct the fight against the corn borer in Grand Traverse and six other counties of that section not having farm agents. He says the invasion of the borer in Northern Michigan is not more than two years away and that unless some way is found to combat the pest, corn must be replaced with other crops.

The ravages of the borer have reached as far north as Bay County.

Air power, in use in a thousand ways in American industry, has been put to work as a new energizing force in modern-day railroading. It plays an important role in the operation of the oil-electric locomotive, newest power of the rails.

DETROIT ATTORNEY TELLS OF FISHERMAN'S HEAVEN INSIDE CITY

William H. Umlor, Detroit attorney, says that he has discovered a fisherman's paradise located in the heart of a Northern Michigan city. "The place is Traverse City," says Mr. Umlor, "through the heart of which flows the Boardman River to be joined a bit down stream by Asylum Creek.

"At the 'big bend' where the river and the creek meet a wooden bridge was built across Wadsworth street, at the end of Fifth street. On this frontage was built my home. A more ideal spot for fishing I have never run across. It is no fiction when I say that trout, speckled, rainbow and brown, leap for food in the early morning sunrise or nightfall, just 30 yards from the house and within several blocks of the postoffice.

"Two weeks in spring the creek bottom is black with suckers spawning, having come the distance from Grand Traverse Bay, up the Boardman River, and Asylum Creek. Children of the town at this time of the year take large pitchforks and by standing in the shallows of the creek, throw bushels of fish on shore. I paid a cent apiece for the larger ones to feed to my chickens until we noticed a fishy taste to the eggs.

"I have gone miles to other streams in search of new angling places, but if the trout would not feed and my basket was light, I could go a few city blocks up stream from my house on Aslyum Creek and hook those 18-inch rainbows that lay there in the deep calmness of the pools scarcely moving.

FORD SCHOOL OPENS, IS CLOSED

Scarlet fever closed Henry Ford's famed schoolhouse at Sudbury, Mass., after one day's session.

Only a landmark for seventy years, the little school house to which Mary was followed by her famous lamb, reentered America's educational system under the personal direction of Henry Ford.

The historic structure, immortalized in nursery rhyme, had been brot to Sudbury from Sterling, 23 miles away, as part of the group of New England antiques assembled by the automobile magnate near him Wayside Inn.

Ford, an early riser, was at the school to welcome 16 children, who came over snow clogged roads in two busses in response to his special invitations.

There was more than one Mary among the scholars, and while no lamb participated in the program, several young sheep were in a nearby fold, for Ford recently decided to prove that sheep could be raised in New England as well as in other parts of the country.

The same bell that once warned the original Mary that the school hour had arrived, called the 16 children to their studies. And for the first time since the Civil War, the little school room rang out with childish voices struggling with the three R's.

Ford bought the school house at Sterling last spring. For 70 years it had served as a barn in connection with the parsonage of the Baptist church. Not only the building itself, but part of the original foundation, was removed.

The school house, restored to its original state, is now located between Wayside Inn and the farm formerly owned by Babe Ruth of home run fame.

It is a typical old New England district school, as white as the snow with which it is now banked. Bright green blinds have been attached to the eight large windows.

An old fashioned red chimney pokes up from the pitched roof. An acre and a half of land is the school yard.

The reopening of the school seemed to have settled— at least in the mind of Henry Ford— the question as to where the Mary's lamb incident occurred. Mary Sawyer of Sterling, has long been claimed by residents of that town as the original Mary. Some time ago, however, a New Hampshire town erected a memorial to Mary and her lamb, claiming the distinction of having been the home of the true Mary.

$12,000 MORE ALIMONY PAID IN COUNTY IN YEAR

The alimony habit is running a close second with the installment business in Jackson county, a report issued by Arthur W. Wiggins, friend of the court, shows. A gain of more than $12,000 in alimony payments in 1926 over 1925 was shown, approximately $57,000 having been paid by 470 persons during that period. Only two were sentenced to prison for failure to pay their weekly stipend, the records show.

HUNTERS FOILED BY DUCKS' FLIGHT

The year 1926 will be remembered as a bad one for the duck hunter in lower Michigan. The northern flight in the fall months was a bitter disappontiment. Canvasbacks, redheads and bluebills failed to appear in anywhere near their customary numbers, and the shoal ducks, such as mallards and teal, were noticeably scarce in the rice beds. The rafts of thousands of coot dwindled this year to a few straggling flocks. There were no snipe back in the bogs and flooded cornfields. The gunner listened in vain for the querulous call of the yelloylegs. The close of the season brought but memories of unsuccessful excursions and empty bags.

Most hunters have come to believe that the game scarcity is positive proof that the supply of our wildfowl is dwindling. But there are many who dispute this theory. They repeat with positiveness the old alibi "the ducks took another course" and they have evidence to back up their assertion.

Robert Lambert, conservation officer of Algonac, who formerly was stationed at Wildfowl Bay, is an observer who scouts the belief that ducks and shore birds are on the wane. He says they are increasing every year. The fall of 1926 was not an exception, Lambert says, and he goes on to explain that unusual weather conditions were responsible for the paucity of birds upon the marshes and lakes of lower Michigan.

Lambert said that on Oct. 11 he knew the duck and shore bird shooting would be poor, for he witnessed thousands of the migrants hurrying southwest and with no apparent intention of stopping in Michigan. He was standing on Westover Hill, near Clare, he said, and studied the flight two hours with a pair of binoculars. There were mallards, teal, pintails, spoonbills, ruddies, canvasbacks, redheads, bluebills and Canada and snow geese in the procession across the sky and it lasted all day. The ducks and geese were making a forced flight from their Canadian breeding places. They had no desire to stop and rest, said Lambert.

"It was a drizzly day," Lambert stated. "Shortly after daybreak I heard the whistle of wings overhead and saw flock after flock of ducks heading southwest. At 11 a. m. I was near Westover Hill, so I decided to climb to the top to watch the flight. In all my life I never saw such a flight of ducks as I did then."

Lambert was brought up upon the Saginaw Bay marshes near Bayport. He has hunted ducks since he was 11 years old, and probably knows as much about their characteristics and behavior as any sportsman in Michigan.

OLD COPPER MINES PUT HOPES IN 1927

The Lake Superior mining regions, heartened with the prospect that the friendly legislation will be enacted by the state legislature now in session, look forward with much hope to 1927.

Foremost among mining bills to be introduced is one to appropriate $50,000 annually for research in the copper and iron districts, supplementing an enterprise initiated by the Michigan College of Mines late in 1926, calculated to lengthen the life of the mining fields by devising methods of treating ore that is now regarded as waste. Some of the best geological and metallurgical minds in the country have been enlisted in the survey and mining men are confident immeasurable good will result.

Incidentally, the outlook for the copper mining industry is brighter than in a decade, and all of the producing mines are endeavoring to expand to keep abreast of the increased demand. All copper consuming centers, notably Detroit, the Connecticut valley and Chicago, are purchasing record-breaking quantities.

Introduction of modern methods accounts for the resumption of operations at the old Cliff mine which has been idle for 40 years, after paying upwards of $2,000,000 in dividends on a negligible investment. This mine, in the early days, was a silver producer of note and large nuggets, worth as much as $5,000 each, were found during the ordinary copper mining operations. Practically all of the mineral came from what are known as "fissure' veins and was pure, mass copper. There were no metollurgical processes known then and nothing but mass copper was considered of value. The discarded ore probably contained from 40 to 70 pounds of copper to the ton, and it is such formations that now will be mined.

Guns in Civil War

The Civil war began with muzzle-loading guns and ended with breech-loaders. Although the breech-loading gun had been invented long before the outbreak of the Civil war, it had not up to that time proved very practical and had not generally been adopted for military uses.

DELICIOUS FROZEN DESSERTS

WINTER is an excellent time to think of luscious frozen desserts, since most people eat more rich foods during the cold weather than at any other time—heavy roast meats, rich dressings, candy, cake and whatnot, and the housewife who uses forethought will have on her menu lists some light desserts, easy to prepare, but tempting and attractive. Frozen desserts are especially good.

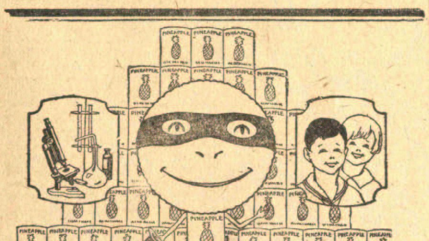
From the eternal summer-time of Hawaii comes pineapple, to add its golden color and its tropical flavor to these iced delicacies. Hawaiian pineapple is especially adapted for desserts because its rich juice contains a digestive property which aids in the digestion of meats.

Frozen Pineapple Bisque is a delicate but delicious dessert simple to prepare. Boil fifteen minutes, two cups water and one cup sugar. Add the syrup drained from a medium can of crushed Hawaiian pineapple and freeze. Before the mixture has frozen hard, fold in the crushed pineapple, from which the syrup has been drained, and one cup whipped cream. Pack and allow to stand one hour before serving.

Pineapple Frappé Hawaiian combines crushed with sliced pineapple in a novel and pleasing way. Mix one cup sugar and two cups water. Boil for twelve minutes. Cool, add two cups ice water and contents of a medium size can of crushed Hawaiian pineapple with three tablespoons lemon juice. Freeze to a mush, but do not repack. Have ready the slices from a medium can of sliced Hawaiian pineapple and place one slice on each plate. Pile the frozen mixture on the slices of pineapple, and top each with a maraschino cherry. Serve as soon as possible.

A more substantial dessert is Frozen Pineapple Custard. Heat two cups milk. Mix two tablespoons flour, two cups sugar and one-eighth teaspoon salt. Add the hot milk, cook in a double boiler, stirring until mixture thickens, then cook ten minutes. Pour onto one beaten egg, return to double boiler and cook three minutes longer, or until mixture thickens, stirring constantly. Chill thoroughly, add one cup cream and contents of small can of crushed Hawaiian pineapple, well drained. Freeze and serve.

A pineapple dessert which is so simple that you can make it in a moment and go away and forget about it until time to serve, is Frozen Pineapple Slice. Pack a large can of Hawaiian sliced pineapple in ice and salt, as you would ice cream, and allow it to stand for three or four hours Add whipped cream before serving.



VITAMINS IN CANNED PINEAPPLE

CAPTURING vitamins and keeping them is the greatest game of food scientists today. In the case of canned pineapple, sunshine captures the valuable vitamin and canning keeps it. After that the game is easy—any one can eat pineapple because pineapple is easy to eat.

Over there in Hawaii, whence comes our canned Hawaiian pineapple, great plantations of pineapple are spread out like a magic carpet in the sunshine of the tropics. There the fruit absorbs sunshine for eighteen months. Being an "air plant," it lives on air and sunshine, and sunshine scientists tell us is largely responsible for the presence of vitamin D. This particular vitamin is beneficial for children since the presence of it prevents rickets.

Other mysterious forces, which only Nature understands, are busy in the meantime capturing two other vitamins, found especially in fruits—Vitamin B and Vitamin C. The former is very essential for children because experiment shows that without Vitamin B young animals soon cease to grow and finally die.

Once captured, the next step is keeping these vitamins. Just as soon as the pineapple is fully ripened in the fields, it is rushed to the big canneries, canned quickly, so that even that most volatile of vitamins, Vitamin C, may have no chance of escape. Canned foods retain vitamins in greater amount than home-cooked foods, recent research at Columbia University has established, due to the intense heat used in the quick process of canning and certain conditions in the sterilizing process.

Mr. George G. Melvin in the Contributors' Column of the Atlantic Monthly for December calls attention to a mis statement made by Mayor Dever of Chicago in an article in the October issue that "Canada had tried and abandoned the experiment of national prohibition." Says Mr. Melvin, "Canada has not had at any time national prohibition and it is at least a debatable question whether the Federal government of Canada has any authority to enact national prohibition as the term is now generally understood. Regulation of the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage lies not with the Federal legislature but with those of the provinces individually."

The Christian Century of December 9 calls attention to the sending out of a questionnaire by the National Economic League to the 4,700 members of its national council asking them to designate which of a list of topics submitted constitute the greatest problem confronting the United States at the present time. The problems which received the largest number of votes were lawlessness 1,203, administration of justice 1,173, world court 950, prohibition 946, taxation 758, moral and religious training 701. The editors say: "Not only does disrespect of law head the list of national perils in the judgment of a group of representative men but at least three of the topics in the above list come under he same head, for what is the chief complaint in connection with the maladministration of justice except that it both reflects and engenders lawlessness, and what is the problem of prohibition enforcement except a particular phase of the general problem of lawlessness There is no doubt about it, civilization totters unless there is a new birth of wholesome public sentiment on these matters, and the American is in a desperate dilemma if his democracy 'bids him make the law he flouts' while his insatiable thirst for individual independence bids him 'flout the law he makes.' And yet, and yet—no nation was ever truly great and no society ever truly fine merely because it perfectly obeyed its laws. Obedience may be the most important issue in a crisis but there is something even more important than that in the age-long and world wide process of developing a perfect society of perfect individuals. Perhaps those who gave moral and religious training had that thing in mind."—The Union Signal.

There's A Row in Sight

Just as we anticipated, the "sob sisters" and the Radicals all over the State are up on their tiptoes at this time over the new law which some legislators would place on the state books for capital punishment It's quite a row, as you will find out if you investigate.

Gov. Green is in favor of tightening up a little on the reins of the criminal jurisdiction, but as to the capital punishment law, he has not committed himself, that we know of. On Tuesday evening the assembled farmers and their families at the M. S. C. campus heard both Judge Collingwood and President Litlte of the University of Michigan speak.

Judge Collingwood is emphatically against capital punishment as are probably most of the Judges in Michigan; either from a sense of too personal responsibility or from the standpoint of general principles. Judge Collingwood ridiculed the idea of establishing the death penalty to prevent crime. He cited the laws of England in ancient days, when men were hung for picking pockets. He said the public was invited to see the Roman holiday and while the spectators universally agreed the punishment was just, yet a number of pockets were picked in the crowd during the execution.

He said the Reformatory at Ionia was a parody on justice and was no place for a young offender, because if the prisoner wasn't a criminal when he went in, he sure would be when he came out. The Judge ridiculed the management and handed the State a "hot one" for not segregating the inmates at Ionia. He says the death penalty has no bearing on crime.

Among other things he said the system of allowing the attorneys to select a jury was another parody. A Judge can pick a fair-minded jury in a few minutes while the lawyers might haggle for days on the same job Gov. Green plans to stop the infernal jockying of the lawyers on jury dockets. Judge Collingwood also stated that in most counties any old farmer of reasonable education and gifted with a supply of common sense could administer the duties of Probate Judge which we should calculate was a far-fetched statement, but probably is true.

Of late we look about and often note both boys and girls between the ages of 6 and 15 years usually who are apparently undernourished and thin. Not much vitality and not much benefit from what food they eat is obtained by such children We wish every father and mother in the township could have heard the remarks of Dr. McLain of Quincy at a P. T. A. meeting not long ago in our village, relative to the matter. It is an un-deniable fact that the only way to raise healthy children (science has proved it) is to study their diet and rations the same as you study fodder for your high grade dairy cow. You desire the cow to produce the greatest possible amount of butter-fat, and you want the boy and girl to devel op bone, muscle and vitality which is their birthright. In order to best thrive and get the best start, your youngsters should have a daily ration to suit their particular cases. What will produce strong healthy growth in some children may produce indigestion and neuasthenia in others. Just what produces the best growth in kids can be determined by experimenting with various foods. Dr. McLain especially warned against too much high seasonings and pepper and not enough calcinous and bone-producing elements. Candy and sweetmeats are bad for the delicate child.

Broadcasting Church Services

Those who happen to be fortunate enough to own radio outfits and who listen in each Sunday morning during church hour will be delighted with the distinctness of the reception over the air from WJR Detroit broadcasting the regular morning services of the First Baptist Church at Pontiac. As far as the clearness is concerned one gets just as good satisfaction as if he or she were in the auditorium of the church. It is little less than marvelous that science has done this. As a matter of fact the whole service from the ringing of the church bell to the benediction comes here unhindered. There seems to be no atmospheric changes which interfere with the wave length from Detroit. Those who tune in will admit Rev. H. H. Savage is one of the most interesting speakers in the pulpit of Michigan. His assistant Rev. Ketchum, is a splendid tenor songster, and together these gentlemen make the morning church hour one of profit and pleasure. The value of this service to the listeners of southern Michigan, northern Indiana and Ohio, parts of Canada, Wisconsin and Illinois and even remote districts of Pennsylvania is unparalleled, especially so to shut ins and the bed-ridden and sick in hospitals and homes. It is estimated that many thousand of these constantly rely upon the Radio and find it brings the outside world to them in wonderful shape. Rev. Savage the popular pastor of the First Baptist church is in every sense of the word a liberalist—one of the old-time believers in congenial Christianity, and his sermons sparkle and bubble over with good thoughts and humor.

He announced last Sunday that the church had just signed up with WJR for another year of this wonderful work. At a later hour Radio people are able to listen to services at the First Methodist church of Detroit also the Woodward Avenue Presbyterian church of which Rev. Magary is pastor and in the evening the church at Pontiac puts on a short half hour of extra services along the evangelistic line.

Each week large numbers of letters are received by Rev. Savage from his listeners in all parts of the Central states and Canada and of course only a few of these can be acknowledged each Sunday morning. At the Woodward Avenue Presbyterian church the Question Box is proving very popular and many interesting and unknown facts are brought out. Anyone who cares to, whether a listener or not, is allowed to submit questions to this department. Address your questions to Rev. Magary, Station WJR Detroit or the Presbyterian church Woodward Avenue Detroit

Curious Names

Talk about your "funny" names Mt Clemens Michigan sure has them all beat for the exceedingly tongue twisted polyglot names of their vicinity. Whether it is the result of too much mineral water which draws plebeians hence from all nations and climes or just the natural result of our great National Mixing Pot nobody knows: It used to be said the most of these peculiar names came from the early French settlers but now it is a happy combination of Russian—Pollock—the Lord knows what. Here they go: Real estate is sold by Kaess & Ralph; R. O. Fagur is a lawyer; so are James Spier, B. V. Nunnelley, Jim Segesta, Rosenbusch & Retzlaff. Corpses are buried in good shape by Swarzkoff undertaker, who may be a Russian Moujik for all we know. O'Mara is a civil engineer; Mr. Wildt sells real estate. Don't know whether he is Russ or Pollock; Jake Curlett M. D., treats all ailments of the human family; as does Fred Lenfesty while Mary Gryseels makes dresses for Lenfesty's wife. Clarence Ollis the rascal, steals autos; Victor DesMaris is a private in the army and is so stout he tears a whole pack of cards at once; Adolphus Melkenbaugh died the other day (poor cuss). The Mount Clemens city council carries such names as Sierens, Schott, Peltier, Streit, Gus VanPamel, De Vantier; Priehs sells Dodge cars; DeSlover is a locksmith; John Lungerhausen is Circuit Court Commissioner; Frank Kulodziciski is an attorney; and Charlie Hummrich is Probate Judge; Bill Schoof keeps good dairy cows as does Mr. Hartzig; Margaret Hackathoen wants a divorce from her hubby, so likewise does Ruth Mattern; E. Wohlfeil sells furniture; Robert DeGroff, Sarah Fogelsonger, Dorothy Frohin, and John Biskoff are dead and gathered to their fathers, Gene LeCroix is a bum, so the Judge says; George Rockaseus is deputy sheriff and Bill Busse and Pete Sawn are Justices of the Peace; Al Dierwester, Lee Gellack and Len Rodieck are aeroplane pilots while Anthony Schiappacassee and his wife Mary are in a row.

All these funny jokes and a lot more are found in the columns of the Mount Clemens paper. Now turning to our own community many of our handles look very ridiculous to strangers who never heard of them before. Here are a few: Pulaski Church, Morehouse, Tom Fant, Piper, Right spelled (Wright), Cheney, Helmick which sounds like Helmet, Nafsinger etc. Lucky is the person who can qualify under the plain old names such as Brown, Smith, Jones, Williams.

Women To Have Own Farm Week Program

A program of educational entertainment features which matches that to be given in the men's section has been provided for the women of Michigan from January 31 to February 4, according to the Farmers Week program just issued here.

The immediate, everyday problems of the housewife are given a prominent place in the sessions held during the week. The proper management of a home vegetable garden, which task is turned over to the housewife during the rush of farm work, will be discussed by George E. Starr, specialist in horticulture. Home beautification is the subject of a talk by O. I. Gregg, landscape specialist.

Dr. Caroline Hedger, who is nationally known as an authority on child training, will meet Michigan women twice during the week. The Reverend Caroline Bartlett Crane, who always has a message of importance, has as her subject, "Home Making and Citizenship." An expert furrier from the Albrect Fur Company of Minneapolis will tell the story of how furs are made up and how to tell what kind of fur is in any particular garment.

The home economics department of the College will serve tea three afternoons during Farmers Week. A day nursery will be maintained so that mother can attend the sessions while the children are having a fine time by themselves. There will also be many special exhibits of interest to housewives.

The Potato Train

Preliminary work regarding the operation of a potato train thru south-western Michigan by the New York Central Lines in co-operation with the M. S. C. next March have just been completed with a series of meetings with county agricultural agents, potato growers through out southwestern Michigan and representatives of the M. S. C. and New York Central Lines.

This train will operate thru the counties of Eaton, Jackson, Calhoun, Kalamazoo, VanBuren, Allegan. Berrien, Cass, St. Joseph, Branch and Hillsdale during the two weeks of March 14th to 26th.

This train of four cars carrying a crew of well trained potato experts will make stops one half day each with about twenty five meetings in all. Everything regarding potato culture will be discussed. Particular emphasis will be placed on the use of certified seed and plans are now under way to distribute limited amounts of certified seed at each stop. The schedule is now in the making and will be announced following the Farmers' Week conferences, January 31st to February 4th.

Farm Bureau Legislative News

As the Legislature has not been in session for two weeks, there have been no new bills introduced. State Senator Peter Lennon has a resolution before the Senate committee for the state Legislature to ask Congress to pass the McNary Haugen bill which is also strongly backed by the Farm Bureau, as a farm relief measure.

Another great boon to agriculture and industry can be accomplished by the development of the St Lawrence project. By digging a ditch 100 feet wide, 25 feet deep and 25 miles long. 94 percent of all the shipping of the world could come to Detroit, Toledo and other lake ports. There is a half billion bushels of grain affected by the transportation conditions of the Great Lakes, its price is set in Liverpool. By opening up the Great Lakes to ocean vessels we could add 10c a bushel to all the wheat which we sell in the great mid-west, not only that which we export but that which we market here at home. This would mean fifty million dollars more per year. Add that to the income of mid western farmers and you will write "prosperity" across the skies of America. Let us open the St. Lawrence and have practically the same ocean rate to European markets and every other port in the world that New York City enjoys. This will mean emancipation for forty million land-locked people. Ex Gov. W. L. Harding of Iowa, president of the Great Lakes St. Lawrence Tidewater Association, at the Great Lakes St. Lawrence meeting at Muskegon where 500 delegates were in attendance.

Sec. of Commerce, Herbert Hoover says "The vital need and feasibility of the St. Lawrence Waterway has been determined"

O. C. Holcomb, Minute man of Adams Township.

Report Of The Sheriff's Office. Week Ending Jan. 29

In Justice Fitzsimmons Court, Hubert Long, who was arrested Saturday, was arraigned on a vagrancy charge. He plead guilty and was sentenced to pay a fine of $10 and costs of $5.90, or spend 20 days in jail.

On Monday evening, Freida Slocum, age 14 of Hillsdale was brought before Judge Guernsey in the Juvenile Court. Freida has, for several months past, been a problem to County Officials ranging from County Commissioner and City Superintendent of schools to the Prosecutor and Sheriff. Freida was certainly headed for the State School at Adrian, until due to the plea put forward by the Capt. of the Salvation Army and his loyal wife, who knowing something of conditions that were contributory to Freida's position, offered to take Freida into their home and be responsible to the Court for her conduct for a period of 30 days. Judge Guernsey approved of the offer and so ordered.

On Wednesday the Sheriff and Mrs. Kerr conducted Miss Nora Harmon of Allen to Wahjamega, the State Home for Epileptics.

James Manning, wanted by Sheriff Wilson of Lenawee County on a Contempt charge, was arrested in Pittsford Township by the Undersheriff and deputy Lauder. Manning was surr nded to Lenawee County authorities the same day.

Apparently practically all of the Hillsdale County automobiles have been properly licensed. Occasionally an owner is found, who has had trouble with his title, or has lost his bill of sale, or has recently moved here from another state. These cases are rare, however. Less than a dozen cases have been brought before the Justices the past week.

Mrs. Winifred Scholl, of Pittsford, purchased license plates 183,558, direct from Lansing. They were mailed Jan. 12 but were never received by Mrs. Scholl. If these plates are seen, please notify this office.

Mr. Lawrence Foster reports theft of 40 chickens from his farm in Somerset Township.

The robbery of Payne & Scovill's mill, in Hillsdale on January 16th has finally been cleared up. Two small boys Clifton Collins and Forrest Biner, after considerable questioning, admitted to the Sheriff that they had broken into the mill, and after attempting to crack the safe with a small crowbar had taken a small quantity of office supplies, etc., The stolen goods were recovered and the young burglars were taken before Judge Guernsey and placed on probation.

Tax Payers To Hold State Conference

Representatives of various tax paying interests of Michigan and many individual tax payers will attend a conference at M. S. C. February 9 for the purpose of discussing the tax situation in this state, according to announcement of R. Wayne Newton, research associate in the economics department of the College.

John Brown, president of the Indiana State Board of Tax Commissioners, and Harry Miessee, of the Indiana Taxpayers Association will be present at the local conference. These men will explain some of the accomplishments in Indiana along the line of tax reduction. The Indiana Taypayers Association was formed to study ways of reducing the tax burden in the State. By educational work, the association has been able to reduce the tax levies for both State and local units.

President Kenyon L. Butterfield of M. S. C. has called the conference for February 9 in the belief that Michigan tax payers are much interested in tax matters and should have the opportunity of hearing the Indiana plan explained. Mr. Newton, who will be in charge of the relation between farm taxes and the yield upon investment which is obtained by the owners of rented farms in Michigan.

State Corn King Is Crowned At M. S. C.

Paul Clement of Britton, a leading corn grower of Monroe county was crowned Michigan Corn King at the annual meeting this week of the Michigan Crop Improvement Association, held as a part of Farmers Week at M. S. C.

Mr. Clement's official yield was 90 bushels of shelled corn per acre brought in the greatest returns over the cost of purely cultural operations of all of the contestants entered in the Five Acre Corn contest, sponsored by the crops association and the farm crops department of the college.

Widely known as a seed corn grower, and last fall elected one of the charter members of the honorary Michigan Master Farmers club Mr. Clement grew his big 1926 crop on land which had previously been in alfalfa. The seed was of his own breeding and is known as Clements White Cap.

Ernest Gilbert, of Coldwater, who holds the contest yield record of 112 bushels per acre, made in 1925, finished second in 1926 with a yield of 89 bushels per acre.

Bronze medals, awarded for yields of 75 bushels to 85 bushels per acre, were given to Otto Wegner, Riga, for a yield of 84 bushels per acre; George Bruce, Britton, 81 bushels per acre; and Fritz Mantey, Fairgrove, 75 bushels per acre.

The Legislative Question

Our law makers at Lansing are principally concerned at present with the new bill advocating capital punishment in Michigan. While it is conceded there is a much stronger demand for it now than ever before yet there are many ministers of the gospel and others outside the churches who do not want any such law put on the statute books because they say that God Almighty never intended this world to be run on a basis of "life for life." Well, bless your hearts, if your conscience won't allow you to sanction this law, you need to look after some other things which we are doing and which church people and all seem to think are perfectly correct according to Blackstone. Some editors tell us that both Indiana and Ohio have capital punishment and murders are more numerous down there, but we don't believe it. Even if this be true we see no reason for keeping the cold blooded murderer alive at the expense of the state of Michigan. By "cold blooded" we mean the person who goes and deliberately kills a fellow being after due consideration because of jealousy, hate or other sinister motives. For murderers who are provoked to anger and who kill under the spur of the moment we are not favoring capital punishment. For instance the man and woman at Mt Clemens who recently plotted and carried out the shooting of a husband simply to get him out of their way richly deserve the electric chair or hanging. People who are so terribly lax in their moral natures as to consent to such a crime by every sign of the clock are degenerates and degenerates will always remain, and the less degenerates of homicidal tendencies we keep on this earth better it is for everybody. After all the real suffering (if such the ministers and sob squad refer to as objectionable) is extremely short in either the electric chair or lethal gas China has inflicted the death penalty for many centuries, and we'll defy the scientist to point to a more expert nation on the morality question than the Chinese. They appear to be terribly shocked by our hangings, as they seem to think the suffering is awful. Their method of beheading while it is bloody, is in most cases instantaneous—so we should say it would be on a par with either lethal gas or electricity. As a sample of how strict the Chinese nation is, we might cite the case of a railway engineer who had on his train a couple of government aeroplanes loaded in such a way that they projected wider than the track. This man ran his train through a narrow viaduct and the aeroplanes were ruined. Punishment was terrible and swift in his case. He was at once beheaded alongside his engine at the next stop. We fail to see where the logic of these sob sisters holds good and we fail to see where Michigan's extremely mild laws are helping the suppression of crime in the least. Of course we'll admit it will get on the nerves of the judges quite generally at first to sentence men with that omnious phrase "You are to be hung by the neck until you are dead, and may God Almighty have mercy on your soul." Judges we imagine are human and they hate to do this. But something has just got to be done—that's all. Human morals are getting so lax in Michigan women are poisoning their husbands for the whim of a paramour, young boys are butchering their parents, parents are fostering killing of undesirable children, beneficiaries are putting insurance risks to death all these and many more crimes might be enumerated—because the morals are dead and conscience hard as adament. However, we do not believe the capital punishment law would stop all this, nor do we think that the criminal be he an amateur or a veteran, ever stops to think of the punishment when he commits the crime, but we do believe after about ten years of public hangings that our citizenship might become horror stricken enough to mend their ways.

PINEAPPLE FROM THE PARADISE ISLANDS

By Capitola Williams Ashworth

WHEN you sit down to breakfast and find a dish containing a golden island of pineapple surrounded by an amber sea of liquid awaiting you, do you find your mind trying to picture the tropical islands in the midst of the beautiful Pacific Ocean where this luscious fruit was grown, and where it last saw the light of day before it was popped into a can in the heyday of its life and started on its long journey to your table?

The story of pineapple is probably one of the most interesting of any fruit in the world, even of any other tropical fruit.

In the Hawaiian Islands, principally the islands of Oahu and Lanai it is grown extensively. In fact, the tremendous, carefully tended plantations, spread out over these islands, are one of the sights and wonders of the place to tourists. In a land where palms wave in the sunlit air, where almost every tropical fruit and flower known in the world blossoms and ripens, keeping the ocean breezes laden with their sweet and heavy fragrance, the pineapple ranks as the King of Fruits, it is the most luscious of all tropical products, one of the juiciest, healthiest, and most useful fruits that are grown.

The appearance of a pineapple plantation is that of a million of cactus plants marching over plateaus and up hill and down in orderly rows, the lines as straight and beautiful as soldiers ever marched in parade, every soldier plant bearing a tremendous pine cone in its center, regally topped with a crown of pointed leaves. It is its resemblance to a pine cone, together with the tart and juicy nature of the meat that has given the fruit the name of pine-apple.

As pineapples are grown in tremendous quantities in the Hawaiian Islands, or the Paradise Islands, as they are popularly called, many hundreds of thousands of cases are canned every year and shipped to the United States, England, Europe, Asia, Australia and practically every corner of the world. Those people who live in the Hawaiian Islands may have fresh pineapple three times a day, and many of them do, as it is a fruit one does not tire of easily and is a great boon to the health, particularly of people who do not lead an active physical life. However, this same pineapple which comes to us in cans, is equally as healthful as the fresh and much more palatable than the fresh that we are able to obtain in American markets, for the reason that the so-called fresh pineapple has to be plucked while still green and unmatured in order to stand the long trip to market. This is true even of the few pineapples that are grown in the United States.

Many housewives are learning to prize this tropical fruit that comes to her in a tin can with all its exotic and delicious flavor preserved and enhanced by the addition of sugar and cooked just long enough to make it absolutely safe and sanitary. As a matter of fact, many people, even in the Paradise Islands where the fresh fruit may be had in its glory, prefer the canned because the sugar has sweetened the juices and penetrated to the very fiber of the fruit. Also the fact that it is canned in its prime when it has reached a golden perfection of ripeness makes it more palatable than most fresh fruits and melons that can be obtained in the market.

There are many other fruits grown in these delightful islands, about which most people know little or nothing. There is the papaya, a melon which grows on trees, and is served at breakfast, or for salads, breadfruit which is baked and served as a starchy vegetable, mangoes, guavas, bananas, and rose apples. And, of course, there are coconuts. Yet the favorite of the islands is the pineapple, which is shipped in cans to every corner of the world, the greatest amount coming to the United States where it is served on the American table as a salad, a dessert, a pie, or with vegetables and in cocktails, and is becoming increasingly popular in fruit punch to which it lends a delicious tang and a tropical flavor that can be obtained in no other way.

World Shut Out

In the parlor of the monastery one wall consists of two iron grilles, set about a foot distant from each other. This grating is closed until some friend or relative comes to visit one of the cloistered sisters. Through this double grille they converse, the bars reminding them constantly that the nun has given up the world and the things of the world, the better to contemplate the things of the world to come.

As is customary in most of the contemplative orders of the Catholic church, the nuns are divided into three classes: the choir sisters, who recite the office and engage in needlework, the lay sisters, who devote themselves to various tasks of manual labor in the convent, and the extern, or outside sisters, who live outside of the cloister and act as the representatives of the cloistered nuns with the outside world.

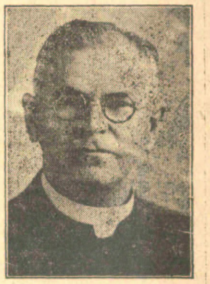
With their novices and postulants, the nuns in the Monastery of the Blessed Sacrament, Detroit, number 88, besides which there are four extern sisters. They came to Detroit in 1906 from the original American foundation in Newark, N. J. At present their branch of the order has houses in Newark, New York City, Detroit, Albany, Cincinnati, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

"The people who denounce Rome for the Vanderbilt-Marlborough annulment added Bishop Gallagher, "show slight acquaintance with the legislation which the Church enacted in her struggle of centuries to elevate woman to a place of equality with man. For nineteen centuries the Church has had to deal with similiar cases because the passions and ambitions of men are the same through the ages".

PARISH OBSERVES PASTOR'S AND OWN ANNIVERSARIES



REV. JAMES STAPLETON

The thirtieth aniversary of the ordination of the Rev. Fr. James Stapleton, pastor of Annunciation church, Detroit, and the twentieth anniversary of his pastorate were celebrated recently when friends of Father Stapleton, both clerical and lay, and members of the parish, gathered to do honor to his three decades of service and to wish him many more years of success.

Father Stapleton is one of the best known priests in Michigan. He is a son of the state, having been born in Emmet, where he received his early education in the public schools. Later he attended St. Jerome's Academy, in Kitchener, Ont., and Assumption College, in Sandwich. His classical studies were made at the University of Detroit and he was graduated in theology from Mt. S. Mary's seminary, Baltimore, Md. Before founding Annunciation parish, 20 years ago, he was for a time pastor of the Church of the Sacred Heart, Bad Axe, and assistant pastor at St. John's church, Jackson.

Although Father Stapleton's ordination took place in July, 30 years ago, and he founded the parish 20 years ago in May, the celebration had to be postponed several times. Presentation of a marble altar to the church, which was not completed until last fall, was one reason for the postponement. The altar, which was imported from Italy, was recently consecrated by the Rt. Rev. Michael J. Gallagher, D. D., bishop of Detroit.

Father Stapleton was the guest of honor at a special program arranged by Annunciation societies in the parish hall, at which each organization staged its own specialty and a diversified bill of short playlets, musical numbers and humorous treats were offered.

STATE CATHOLIC WOMEN IN 2-DAY CONFERENCE

Large Michigan Delegations Take Part in Annual Meeting

Catholic women from all over Michigan attended the second annual two-day conference of the League of Catholic Women which was held in the Hotel Statler, Detroit. Especially large delegations were present from Flint, Mt. Clemens, Pontiac and Ann Arbor. A feature of the conference was the address of the Rev. Fr. Alphonse M. Schwitalla, S. J., of St. Louis University, who spoke on "Heredity and Human Conduct."

High Mass at St. Aloysius church opened the meeting. At the close of the first day, a dinner was given to which the delegates brought their husbands and fathers in order that the men might become familiar with the work accomplished by Catholic women.

The second day was devoted to a discussion of social problems, reports and the election of a board of directors. The Bonstelle Playhouse was taken over by the League of Catholic Women for one evening for the entertainment of delegates.

Roberta Risks It

-© MARGARET CAMERON LEWIS

BY MARGARET CAMERON

CHAPTER THIRTY-NINE

After reporting the interview to Roberta on their way home, Piggy said with a chuckle: "He looked me over and quizzed me to his heart's content and didn't tumble. So that's all right. Nobody's going to suspect us now."

His chuckles deepened into laughter when Janet gave them her account of the invasion of their domestic canctuary.

"Billy," he exclaimed. "They've swept and sifted us. We're safe."

Celia, whom he now saw for the first time since bandaging her ankle the night before, looked up at him with a tremendous smile from the couch to you! I don't know how I can ever thank—"

"Oh, rats!" Piggy interrupted, grinning at her. "Forget it! I've had the time of my life. Anyhow, you'd be there yet, if it hadn't been for Bob. It was hed scheme. I didn't know a bonfire would scare them silly—and I never would have thought of those cats in a million years!" He chortled joyously. "If you're so chock full of gratitude that you can't hold it, spill it on Bob. She's responsible."

Roberta shook her head. "No, Peter, you're the hero of this little tale," she said lightly, but with the mysterious something in her face that always set his heart hammering and gave him an insane and otherwise unprecedented desire to kiss her. "I may have thought of the cats, bpt you found them. You've done everything. I owe you a lot besides money," she added, more soberly, "and there must be a lot of that."

"Oh, not so much. I've still got some left and the worst's over. All we have to do now is to sit tight until the tumult and the shouting dies. The rest's easy."

Wherein he failed to take account of several gathering forces, among them Clifford Nixon's recurrent memory of an elusive but haunting resemblance, the widespreading ripple from a pebble of gossip carelessly thrown, and the power of the press.

The last of these was the first to manifest itself, for Nixon's assiduity in spreading the news of Celia's abduction among the peace officers of a dozen towns became known, and Scott's prominence as a wealthy manufacturer multiplied the news value of the story. Consequently Boston reporters appeared uponthe scent before night, and their New York breehtren flocked in a few hours later, all sharp set to pounce upon every clue.

Scott locked his gates and loosed his dogs, conducting all business by telephone. The only persons admitted to the Birchwood grounds, and these only after submitting credentials to the gardener, were detectives summoned from New York, all of whom, to their intense disgust, were forbidden to disclose to newspaper men any knowledge they might have of the case, on pain of instant annihilation. In vain they argued that publicity might lead to important information. Scott was obdurate. He had no stomach for public announcement of previous trouble with his family and his elder daughter's probable part in this affair. Nixon, under orders and besieged at the Jaffrey Inn, refused to be interviewed.

There fore the reporters gleaned what and when and where they could, learning the little that was known and much that was surmised concerning Roberta's declaration of independence and usbsequent risinheritance. The next day, conservative papers in both cities discreetly hinted at a breath in Scott's family relations, alleged details of which were spread in headlines over the first pages of sensational sheets. But no intimation of the exile's presence in her own country leaked out. She was supposed to be in Paris.

The sheriff at Fitzwilliam, bound by no oath of secrecy, confided to his fellow villagers that it was a darn shame for Scott to suspect that poor, folorn little widow, just because she happened to be a stranger. Anybody could see that she and her help were nice, quiet respectable folks. He would'nt blame her a mite if she packed up and left, after a thing like this. Fitzwilliam, agreeing with him, naturally talked. As a result, heporters in livery buggies sped through the woods, to swarm at Fitzwilliam, seeking interviews, and it developed upon Janet and Piggy to hold them at bay. Mrs. Smith, prostrated by this distressing publicity, was said to be confined to her bed.

As far as possible, Peter Brown also kept in the background, fearing that some of these lynx-eyed, crafty news hounds might have known him by sight during a former somewhat spectacular incarnation and be keen enough to recognize him. One of the New York men, however, succeeded in cornering him in the barn, having been informed by the grim Janet that Mrs. Smith was unable to see anyone and that she herself refused to answer impairtinent questions.

"Say, look her, bo," said Piggy confidentially, "call it off, will you; we ain't done nothin to nobody, an' we ain't got nothin' to tell. Poor Mrs. Smith's been all in, anyhow, ever since he died, an' this thing's made her sicker. What's the use o' draggin' her into it?"

"Why did Scott have her house searched, then?"

"Search me! Because she's the only stranger around here, I guess. Or else the old goat's batty. He hunted in every closet an' under all the beds an' everything, an' didn't find nothin'. That oughter be enough. He could buy and see her thre times over, an' maybe he thinks his money gives him a right to walk on her—or maybe he things a woman can't do nothin' to get back at him. But you take it from me tha if Horatio Smith was alive—"

"Horatio Smith, eh? Came from Seattle, didn't you? Was he well known out there?"

"Not so very. Had his friends, o' course, but he was a quiet sort o' guy. Never mixed around much. Used to read a lot—an' he was awful fond o' her."

"Who were his friends there?"

"Aw, come off! I ain't goin' to set no dogs on them. What you guys got against her, anyhow? Can't you let the poor thing have a little peace? She's got trouble enough now, without all this."

"Nixon saw her the other day and recognized her."

"He did not. Jonesy, down at the store, told me all about that the same day. Nixon said she looked like some friend of his, so Jonesy told him who she was—where she come from an' everything—an' Nixon said she couldthat. Go an5 ask Jones yourself—or Nixon either."

The reporter had already interviewed Jones. Fixing the other with a penetrating stare, he inquired suddenly:

"What does a young fellow like you dye his hair for?"

The heart of Percival Galahad Brazenose turned three complete somersaults before settling down to a rate approaching two hundred a minute, but his steady gray eyes never wavered and his grin looked humorous.

CHAPTER FORTY

"Because my hair's really red," said Piggy glibly, "an Mrs. Smith wouldn't stand for it. She said I could have the job, only for my hair. It didn't go with the car we had then, an' she hates red hair, anyhow. So I said if that was all was the matter, I'd dye it black. You have to do things like that some times with women. It beats the devil what notions they take. But it's nothin to me what color my hair is, long's I get paid for it. Now say, don't you print that. Mrs. Smith wouldn't like it, an' she's all right. She's got some cranky notions, same as all women have, but she's a good boss an' I don't want to lose my job. You won't print it, will you? The reporter promised, laughing, and Piggy went on: "Say, can't you call off them other guys? Honest, we can't tell you a thing about this girl that's run away or been stole or something. If we could, we would. She ain't nothin' to us and we ain't got nothin' to hide. But it's just about killed her to be dragged into it this way. I'm worried about her—honest, I am."

The reporter, who was attached to one of the more dignified metropolitan dailies, conceded that it was unjust to subject a lady to publicity in any affair with which she had had no actual connection. He promised to deal gently with her himself, pending possible later developments, and to exhort his confreres to do likewise, and he kept his word. Full accounts of the futile searching of Mrs. Smith's premises appeared the following morning in certain papers, with descriptions of the house, the car, the prostrated widow and her servants, but without underlying insistence upon her complicity in the abduction—partly because, before these reports were written, a new clue had been presented.

Rumors of a high-powered automobile whizzing without lights over the road via Ballou to Keene, on the night of Celia's disappearance, were strengthened by an imaginative farmer living several miles north of Keene, on the highway to Newport and the Canadian border. This person was very certain that he had heard the fugitives pass his place at a death-defying speed in the small hours, which again directed suspicion toward Nixon, who had neglected to warn officers along that route. A flying squad of reporters detached themselves from the main body to follow this trail, and the mystery car superseded the widow in public interest.

Piggy was still mopping cold perspiration from his brow when he related his experience with the reporter to Roberta and Celia.

"Golly, that was a narrow squeak," he concluded. "I thought he had me, for a minute."

"Not you, Peter," Roberta said, laughing. "I'd have collapsed on the spit and confessed all. How on earth do you think so fast?"

"Natural born liar, I guess." He grinned at her over his shoulder as he went to his room.

"He's a natural born paladin!" Celia exclaimed, frankly and enthusiastically sentimental. "Roberta, doesn't he make you think of a knight of old? You know—riding around the country championing imprisoned princesses and breaking spells and slaying dragons—that sort of thing?"

"H'm—well—I hadn't thought of it," was the mendacious reply. But she had thought of it, for during long hours of comradely discouse Piggy unwittingly had made his underlying ideals clear to her.

Afterward, retailing his latest adventure to Janet in the kitchen, Roberta said, "Celia thinks he's like a knight in the days of chivalry, delivering the oppressed—and he is, rather."

"Ou aye, he's no sic a bad lad," Janet vouchsafed, her strong dialect, sure indication of stirred emotion, belaying the severity of her tone.

"He doesn't know it—he's not self-conscious—but he is rather like Galahad—a modern Galahad," Roberta continued dreamily, her thoughts dwelling on a moment of which Janet could not know. But the elder woman shot a surprised glance at her.

"So he telt ye that? I wouldna hae thocht it. He's aye been ashamed o' his name."

Roberta came out of her revery with a snap, a gleam in her eyes that would have warned Janet and not that astute and loyal soul been looking down at a pan in her hands through a mist that she was loath to have another perceive.

"It's nothing to be ashamed of," the girl managed to articulate. Her lips were twitching.

"So I say. Percival Galahad Brabenose is naught tae bring shame tae ony lad. His mither chose the name when she lay dyin', i' the hope that he'd live up to 't. 'I'll no be here tae teach him, Janet,' she said, 'but my laddie maun be brave an' strong an' pure i' heart.'"

"Well—he is," Roberta murmured chokingly, and made her escape, with laughter on her lips and tears in her eyes.

Percival Galahad Brazenose! Oh, la, la!

CHAPTER FORTY-ONE

It chanced that Roberta did not see Piggy alone again that day, and for some time after she went to bed she lay awake, wickedly dimpling and whispering through the walls to Celia's unsuspecting paladin: "You would kiss me, would you? And then do it again—wee, modest, crimson-tipped flower that you are! Galahad! Percival Galahad! Oh, la, la!

Nixon, also, was wakeful. This, however, was now no novelty to him. Over an dover, as he tossed to and fro, his mind retraced in weary circles the incidents leading to his present predicament. Who was the person whom he had sent to meet Roberta? A carefully worded advertisement in New York papers, asking the young man who had kindly met a stranger at that train to communicate with C. B. N., Jaffrey, New Hampshire, had brought no reply. Since the fellow had taken her to lunch, he would at least be able to report something of her reactions to the message that her finance could not meet her, though obviously he had accepted her statement that she would sail again on the following Saturday with a client—a mythical person in whose existence Nixon put no trust. Roberta, with characteristic pride and resource, had merely been trying to blind this unknown to the fact that she had been deserted on her wedding day. The unhappy suitor groaned. If only she had understood why he had failed her—given him an opportunity to explain!

Sure that it was she who had abducted Celia, he doubted that they were still in the vicinity of Birchwood—and yet no trace of them had been discovered elsewhere. Mrs. Smith's resemblance to Roberta was evidently pure coincidence. The search of her house—he turned hot all over, ashamed of his part in that episode—had yielded nothing, and her servants had shown neither indication of guilt nor the slightest tendency toward concealment. That old Scottish house keeper was proof, in herself, of unculpability. He knew the stern rectitude of Janet's type, which would go far for affection, but could not be bought; and he knew also that Roberta had had no opportunity to win the loyalty of such a person among her family's constantly changing retainers. And the chauffeur—who was it the fellow made him think of? There was something about his figure—the set of his shoulders and the poise of head—his clear gray eyes—oh, well!

If the man who had met Roberta saw that advertisement, perhaps — Jove! Nixon sat up in bed, staring into the darkness. That was it! The chauffeur looked like the man who had met Roberta! Exactly like him, except that his hair and eyebrows were black. And Mrs. Smith, aside from her face, which apparently she kept always heavily veiled, looked and moved like Roberta. Coincidence?

Assuring himself that two striking resemblances in one household spread coincidence rather thick, he lay down again. But he tossed no more. He was thinking too intently.

Early the next morning he sought out one of Scott's detectives, whom he took into his confidence, warning him not to let his principal know what was afoot. Scott's temper was becoming more vengeful hour by hour and his savage jibes at Nixon's inability to apprehend the fugitives made it seem that part of wisdom to offer him certainties in future, rather than suppositions, for the sword over the unfortunate young man's head hung by a slender and constantly attenuating hair.

Agreeing that the double resemblance was suspicious, the detective suggested searching the premises again, but Nixon assurd him that these had been very thoroughly investigated, and that, wherever Celia was hidden, it was not about that property. He thought, however, that she might be secreted in the vicinity; possibly—with sudden memory of that alleged call at a dressmaker's—in Keene, where the mysterious Mrs. Smith frequently went. The lady was said to be ill now, and they could not well insist upon seeing her, especially in view of the fact that they wished to avoid publicity; but probably the chauffeur might be forced to confess.

In pursuance of this theory the two proceeded together to Fitzwilliam, encountering their man in the village. Nixon accosted him abruptly, while the eagle-eyed detective watched for a sign.

"I know you now. You're the man I sent to meet a lady at a train."

"Wha-at?" said Peter Brown, who, marking their approach from the corner of his eye, had girded up his mind.

"A week ago last Monday, in New York."

"Say, what's the matter with you guys? Are you all crazy?"

The detective took a shot. "Your hair's dyed."

"Sure it is, but what's that to you? It's my hair, ain't it?"

"What's it dyed for?"

"Well, I wouldn't mind tellin' you, if we'd been interdooced an' you asked pretty. Who are you, anyhow?"

"I'm a detective. And we're onto you, so you'd better come across. It will go easier with you in the end, if you do."

"Ah, go chase yourself!" quoth Peter Brown. "You make me sick. You ain't got nothin' on me, 'cause there's nothing to get. See?"

"You tried to disguise yourself by dyeing your hair, but it's no go. You are the man and we've got you."

"Disguise nothin'! I told one o' them newspaper boys all about it yesterday, but he promised not to tell, 'cause it might lose me my job. You guys don't leave a guy no privacy atall. Don't you want to see my teeth and what color my undershirt is?" Which was reckless, inasmuch as his silken undergarments were of a quality not usually affected by wage-earners—before the war, at any rate.

"Come, come, don't be flippant," said Nixon. "This is a serious matter."

"Well, I didn't begin it, did I? Still since you're so awful polite yourselves I don't mind tellin' you."

Then he repeated the story of Mrs. Smith's immutable aversion to red hair, with a wealth of circumstantial detail regarding feminine foibles he had known during his varied career as a chauffeur that all but convnced the cynical detective of his sincerity. Nixon, however, was unmoved.

"That's ingenious, but you're the man I saw at the ferry—and Mrs. Smith is the lady."

"Aw, go chase yourself into an asylum. That's where you belong. You are bug-house." With that Peter Brown turned his back upon them and sauntered negligently away.

CHAPTER FORTY-TWO

Following a brief consultation, Nixon went back to Jaffrey alone, to send reinforcements, and from that time the Smith house was watched day and night by two men, one of whom had a motor cycle. Neither Janet nor Piggy was permitted, when abroad, to get out of sight of one or the other of the men. Mrs. Smith, behind drawn shades, presumably kept to her bed.

While all this was going on in New Hampshire, Grover Brazenose, in New York, was lying awake nights trying to evolve some plan that might conciliate Scott and induce him to continue their present business arrangement. For without the automatic threading device much of the time saving element in his new machine would be eliminated, and if another, thoroughly equipped loom came into the market, sales of the Brazenoze product might sink to a minimum and the light in his temple grow dim. Perhaps tuberculosis weavers would still be saved bupt the incense of their gratitude would breathe around an alien altar. He craved no personal laudation; he was merely a servant of The Business, pealous for its name.

There was still a remote possibility in view of the cost of the venture, tha Scott's threat to manufacture a new loom had been a bluff and his notice of cancellation of contract with the Brazenose Company a part of it; but, knowing the man, Brazenose knew too that he would risk bankruptcy rather than withdraw from a position once taken, though no such disaster impended in this affair. The one other possibility, equally remote, was that he himself might find another automatic threader suited to his needs, but familiarity with efforts to develop one discouraged hope. Nevertheless, he took immediate steps to stimulate invention, and resolved to make one more desperate effort to induce the erratic and improvident Killigrew to part with his patents.

His irritation was increased by his con's prolonged absence. Not that P. G. as yet occupied an important position in the office, but it annoyed his father that he should be so little ambitions to advance himself in knowledge and authority. It was all very well for the boy to leave town for a day or two, until the flurry of interest in his idiotic drive from the bridge should have subsided, but to make of this an excuse to neglect Business in pursuit of sport approached perversion.

As day after day passed without word from the prodical, Brazenose's impatience grew. Something over a week after the young man's disappearance, it occurred to him that Brainerd Melvin, whom he knew slightly, and sometimes met at the club, had mentioned seeing Piggy somewhere and might know of his plans.

Therefore he made occasion to see Melvin, who reported that he had run across Piggy Monday night in the station at Hartford, where he had been sending a telegram.

"There was a car exactly like his outside, with a woman in it—a widow in deep mourning—and I accused him of iniquity," he said, laughing. Brazenose smiled, too. Women did not figure in his anxieties for his son. "But he said he was off on a hunting trip with another man."

"Oh, that accounts for it. I didn't see him before he left—he went unexpectedly—and I haven't heard from him, so I don't know. I thought he went alone. Did he say who was with him? Or how long they'd be gone?"

"He said it was some important customer of yours from the West. They were going to stop somewhere in Springfield that night, and he said they might end up in Canada."

"I see." Brazenose grew thoughtful. He knew of no customer, important or otherwise, whom, whom Piggy could have taken hunting.

"Speaking of Canada," Melvin went on, "have you seen the newspaper reports about R. K. Scott's daughter? They seem to think now that maybe she's been whisked across the line. You do some business with him, don't you?"

"A good deal."

"It's a queer affair. Do you think that man Nixon was mixed up in it?"

"Impossible! I've met Nixon. He's all right, in every way. He wanted to marry Scott's other daughter."

"That one that's in Paris? Well, I'd hate to be in his boots now, if Scott's got any grip on him. They say he's an ugly brute when he's mad. But whoever took the girl made a good job of it. There don't seem to be any clues at all. That Mrs. Smith, at Fitz-what's-its-name, is pretty well cleared now. They searched her house you know. Hard on her, if she's innocent."

"Very."

"Oh, I say!" Melvin, who knew his old classmate's proclivities passing well, broke into sudden laughter, "Maybe she's the widow I saw at Hartford! It would be a joke if Piggy was at the bottom of this. He could do it."

Brazenose exploded. "Good Lord! Don't be a fool, Melvin! And for God's sake don't start a story like that. The newspapers would grab at it, and they've done enough to P. G. already. You know damn well he never looks at a woman. If he did go in for that sort of monkeyshine, it would not be with R. K. Scott's daughter. Our relations with him are too close."

Melvin explained that he had been joking and that nobody knew better than he the abhorrence in which Piggy held all girls. That was what made the idea so funny. With his promise not to allow his facetious propensities to overcome his discretion, they parted; but the pebble had been cast into Brazenose's mind, and the ripple, destined to swell into a tidal wave, had begun to spread.

Inpuiry at the plant deepened his conviction that no vistng customer could be wth hs son, and he wondered what develtry the boy was up to now. The more he thought, the more hs anxieties about his own relation with Scott, assuming what he assured himself were absurdly exaggerated proportions. However rash Son might be in his devotion to what he called sport he was no fool, and he knew too much about Robert Scott's dispositon to triffle with that particular buzz saw. And yet—when his sympathies were aroused he stopped at nothing. He is impulsive, and impulsed—Oh pshaw It was silly to stew like an old woman. The boy was loyal, even if his love of adventure did sometimes carry him to extremes.

Brazenose settled down to work, but all the afternoon, intermittently, his mind was fretted by that ripple of misgiving, and by irrelevant memories of Piggy's sophomore year at college, when certain freshmen had been ingeniously spirited away and hidden during their class festivites.

RETURNS $20,900 ALLEGED STOLEN AFTER TEN YEARS

Attorney Lester D. Welch, formerly of Traverse City, graduate of the law department of the University of Michigan, has repaid with interest $20,900 he embezzled from five clients in San Diego, Cal., 10 years ago. The amount with interest totaled $30,000 and was sent to James E. O'Keefe, a San Diego attorney, with instructions that the money be refunded.

Reports received here indicate that Welch is in Central America with his wife and son.

Attorney O'Keefe will seek a dismissal of the old embezzlement charges against Welch.

After Welch disappeared in 1916 with the $20,900 intrusted to him nothing had been heard from him until the money was forwarded to O'Keefe.

"The instructions to find the clients and return the money did not come from Welch direct. The word was sent through a friend of his," said Mr. O'Keefe. "Welch's conscience caused him to return the money. He has felt the moral obligation. He is prospering and prominent socially. He did not fear arrest, as the statute of limitation outlawed the case against him years ago."

Mr. O'Keefe has found all the clients except William H. Ehyde. Welch specified that if all the clients could not be found and the money due to those missing was to be given to some Masonic institution.

BANKRUPTCY ACCOUNTING MADE IN VAN BUREN CASE

A decree was signed in the federal district court at Grand Rapids accounting action brought by Charles E. Anderson of Hartford, trustee in bankruptcy for William M. Traver, owner on contract of the Olney farm in Hartford township, Van Buren county at the time bankruptcy proceedings were begun against George R. Dater, Eleanor G. Gray and Humphry S. Gray of Benton Harbor and Simon Acres, Incorporated, of Keeler, Van Buren county. The plaintiff, who claimed the defendants unlawfully took possession of the farm when Traver became bankrupt, denied the trustee's petition to recover the value of growing crops for the year 1922 and rental of land for the same year and denied a petition to recover $1,075 in taxes from Dater, but allowed a claim of $15,000 against the Grays and Dater, which represents the value of Travers equity in the property.

62 BUSHELS OF BARLEY TO ACRE RAISED AT CLIO

Good farming methods, good soil, and the Michigan Black Barbless variety combined to give W. C. Pilter, of Clio, 62 bushels per acre on seven and one-half acres—one of the largest barley yields ever reported in Michigan, according to H. C. Rather, extension specialist of the farm crops department, Michigan State College, and secretary of the Michigan Crop Improvement Association. Mr. Pliter produced his record crop for certification as seed under supervision of the association.

PLAITS COMEBACK FOR SPRING STYLE

The lovely and colorful frocks now being shown in the shops for Southern wear are a forecast of the mode for spring and summer. Plaits are staging a comeback, especially on sports clothes of the popular jumper variety. Skirts entirely plaited, others with a number of plaits in the front are new and offer a pleasant change from the straight-lined models of the past season. Tucks to give desired fullness on the shoulders and diagonal tucks placed through the body of the frock are also interesting acquisitions to the new silhouette.

Two-toned and three-toned materials are novel and artistic and judging from all prophisies will lead the fashion. Charming afternoon gowns in two or three tones of the new medium blue shade, green, rose or gray developed in crepe de chene, georgette crepe, flat crepe, tussore or crepella that look like the stuff that dreams are made of are simply irresistible. Another adaptation of this idea is the combining of black, gray and white or several blues of the pastel shades and white.

The high neck continues in the limelight, although the bateau, V and square neck lines are smart innovations in the spring style notes.

Simple frocks are either one-piece or two-piece, as you will, and many of the one-piece affairs have the illusion of being two-piece. When a frock is of the two-piece variety the skirt and bodice are very often of two harmonizing or contrasting colors. A decidedly new idea is the three-piece ensemble, consisting of sweater and skirt with cardigan jacket added for chic and color or a plain silf frock in either one or two pieces and the new cardigan jacket in silk or jersey with a perky flower in self material attached to the left shoulder.

It has been conceded that apparel which is smart and chic is much more fashionable than simply goodlooking or beautiful clothes. Women who have mastered the art of correct dressing invariably choose that which is extremely smart in preference to something merely becoming. For this reason black is always included in the wardrobe of the well-dressed woman. To obtain the best effort from this somber but indispensable color, the gown should be short of skirt, low of neck and worn either with the very sheer gunmetal or flesh-colored hose.

They are doing almost as many new things with fringes at the moment as they are with scarfs. For example, a black satin dress just imported is trimmed with long silk fringe, which is sewn on a three-inch band of satin and draped around the hips. The long hanging end is then thrown around the shoulders making a transparent fringe cape.

Beautiful jeweled compacts are the latest fad. There are dainty cases of metal in rose or green gold finish. The tops are prettily embossed and jeweled with glowing colored stones. They all fit in a purse, as a rule.

Before Queen Marie reached this country it was reported she would carry a cane. Many of the New York followers of acute fashion purchased walking sticks. Then the Queen arrived sans the cane. Nevertheless, many are carrying the sticks.

Novelty cuff and slip-on styles in gloves are having a great run among the members of the fair sex.

Calf-skin hats are all the rage. Pert, neat, compact, dyed and au naturel, they are appearing everywhere.

COP FROM FARM FAILS TO FALL FOR STOLEN FUR HOAX

Ralph Norred, Highland Park patrolman, hails from a farm in Northern Michigan, but his acumen is developed to a point equal to that of the most sophisticated city dweller, it was revealed when he brought George Hellemeyer, 32 years old, and Edward Daniels, 28 years old, before Justice George L. Badder of Highland Park, on two charges.

Daniels and Hellemeyer made the mistake of sizing up Norred as a gullible purchaser of "choice furs" when they stopped him. As a result they were placed under $600 bond on the charges of attempting fraud and resisting an officer.

Norred testified he was on his way home, dressed in civilian clothing, when two men offered him "stolen furs" at a ridiculously cheap price.

U. S FIGURES PUT FORD STOCK VALUE

The government's claim for additional income taxes of approximately $34,000,000 from the former minority stock holders of the Ford Motor Co. is based on the theory that the Ford stock was worth $3,547.84 a share as of March 1, 1913, instead of $9,489.34. Under the law then in effect, income taxes at the rate of 73 per cent had to be paid on the difference between the valuation of that date and the price at which the stock was sold in 1919, which was $12,500 a share in most cases.

In arriving at the valuation of $9,489.34, P. S. Talbert, acting deputy commissioner of internal revenue, added to the company's earnings of 1912 ($14,119,989.87) its estimated earnings for 1913 ($23,837,377.02), and divided by two, getting $18,978,683.45 as the average annual earnings. He multiplied this by 10 to get the value of the stock, and then divided by the number of shares, 20,000.

Interesting results are achieved by applying the same method to other periods of the company's history. The earnings for 1918 and 1919, as disclosed in the suit of the Parker Rust Proof Co. against the Ford Motor Co., were $60,106,834.75 and $98,957,608.28, respectively. Adding these figures and dividing by two, one gets $79,532,211.51 as the average annual earnings. Under the Talbert system the capitalization would be ten times this figure, or $795,322,115.10, and the value of each share one twenty-thousandth of $795,322,115.10, or $39,766.10. The 8,300 shares not previously held by Henry and Edsel Ford were sold to them during 1919 at from $12,500 to $13,444.43 a share. The former minority stock holders declare they were virtually forced to sell at a low figure by Henry Ford's threat to begin building automobiles independently, in competition with the company.

The earnings for 1922 were $132,339,841.52 and for 1923, $106,320,322.83. The value of each share of stock on the basis of the earnings for these two years would be $59,665.04. Subsequent earnings have not been disclosed.

These comparisons are perhaps not entirely fair, for Mr. Talbert took inton consideration the fact that in 1913 the company was beginning a vast expansion which seemed sure to multiply its earnings.

U. S. TO SPEND STATE $3,250,000

More than $3,250,000 will be appropriated for new federal buildings in Michigan if congress adopts the recommendations of the joint committee of the treasury and post office departments.

The recommendations for Detroit contemplates the sale of the old custom house property and the erection of a modern office building thereon for the federal activities outside of the post office.

The largest Michigan estimate submitted by the committee is $1,000,000 for a new building at Lansing. This includes sale of the present building and purchase of a new site.

Flint is recognized by a recommendation that the present post office building be extended, with purchase of additional land if necessary, at an aggregate estimated cost of $315,000.

At Jackson the recommendation is for the sale of the present post office property and the erection of a new building on a new site, the whole transaction to cost $340,000.

Extension of the post office building at Battle Creek is recommended at a cost of $230,000.

Bay City comes in under the report for an extension costing $225,000.

The committee would give Pontiac an extension of its post office building at $200,000.

Benton Harbor, with an increase of 140 per cent in postal receipts since 1915, is remembered with an estimate of $120,00 for a new building on a site now owned by the government.

U. S. WARNS OF THREE NEW SPURIOUS MONEY ISSUES

The treasury department warns the public that three new counterfeit notes, $20, $10 and $5 bills are being circulated in various parts of the country. The $20 bill is on the Federal Reserve bank of New York, bearing the portrait of President Cleveland. A $10 note, on the Federal Reserve bank of San Francisco, is reported by the secret service as "deceptive" except in the portrait of Jackson and its number. The $5 note is printed on one sheet of paper, without silk threads, and is shorter than the genuine currency.

Kings nowadays seem to be sort of vice presidents.

STATE BASKETEERS SCORE OFTENER BUT FAIL TO WIN GAMES

Michigan State's green basket ball team may have trouble winning games but at least it scores baskets.

In the first six games played this year, State has won two and lost four. But the Spartans have averaged 27 points to a game, to opponents' 33. Last year for the entire season State averaged about 20 points to a game. This year's team, coached under the Van Alstyne system, is fast and aggressive on the offense, but it lacks outstanding guards to keep opponents from ringing the hoop.

State's quintet is composed of three inexperienced men and two regulars from last year. Of the four letter men who reported to Coach Van Alstyne at the start of the season, two stars, Captain Fredericks and Cole, have both been lost by the ineligibility route. Both these men are tall and rangy and would all considerable power to the team.

EGG POOL PLANS IN MICHIGAN FORMED

When the membership campaign for the new Wolverine Poultry and Egg Exchange is launched, educational methods similar to those followed by the Ohio Poultry Producers, Association, through which Michigan eggs will be sold, are expected to be employed.

The failure of many co-operatives in past years has been attributed to "over-selling" by the promoters, who made promises almost impossible of fulfillment. The result was that when the promised benefits did not materialize on schedule, the farmers lost confidence in their organization.

But when the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation fostered the co-operative marketing of eggs in 1925, different methods were used. First, a careful survey was made to determine the need for the co-operative. Then, when the campaign for members was undertaken, there was little of the old-style promotion fervor; rather, the farmers were told what not to expect as well as what to expect.

The results of the individual system are declared to be "spasmodic egg and poultry markets; high cost and inefficient marketing; good eggs not received in sufficient quantities or so guaranteed as to bring best prices."

But "by large volume the association can command the attention of buyers and get better prices. Merchandising eggs throughout the year will prevent much speculation and much of the ups and downs of markets. Te co-operative plan brings payment for quality, and works toward stabilization, orderly marketing and higher price levels."

Eggs alone brought a cash income to farmers last year of more than half a billion dollars. All in all, poultry products accounted for 6 per cent of farm cash income.

"But as large and as important as this income was, it was millions of dollars short of what it should have been. The wrong egg reaching the market was the cause for this tremendous loss.

ELECTRIC MEN CENTER ON LIGHTNING AIRPORTS

Electrical engineers, alive to changing conditions and new demands, are concentrating as never before on the problem of lighting adequately the airports and landing fields established as a result of the Air Commerce Act, and, in the opinion of Alfred Fisher, director of the Public Utility Information Bureau of the Michigan Electric Light Association, startling developments may be expected before the close of the year.

URGES DRIVER'S LICENSE FOR CRIME ACT VOIDED

Revocation of the license of anyone using a car in the commission of a crime of any kind, just as is possible now following conviction of anyone on a charge of drunk or reckless driving, is recommended by Leon F. Miner, who retired Jan. 1, after serving four years as prosecutor of Shiawassee county.

Mr. Miner believes such a law would help to reduce crime. He bases his opinion on his experience in office. He would also do away with the indeterminate sentence law.

"So-called good citizens are as much to blame for crime as anyone else," Mr. Miner says. "They criticize courts for lient sentences, and yet when one of their friends is in throuble they are the first to appeal for leniency in his behalf."

CRADLE OF G. O. P. IN JACKSON RAZED

The last chapter in the history of Bronson hall, one of Jackson's oldest landmarks and better known as the "cradle of the National Republican party," began when workmen started to wreck the building. The hall was one of the first brick structures erected in Jackson.

While historians generally concede that the actual organization of this political group was perfected in an oak grove on July 6, 1854, it is not known generally that a meeting of several factions looking to the formation of a fusion party, actually was called to order in this historic building, where the opening words that led to the ultimate adoption of the party principles were spoken.

A huge throng came from all parts of the state to attend the meeting, and the day being excessively hot, making the interior of Bronson hall almost unbearable, the meeting was adjourned at noon, to be called again under the famous oaks, still standing, where a platform had been erected.

Such famous men as Isaac P. Christiancy, Zachariah Chandler, Austin Blair, John J. Bagley, H. P. Baldwin and Jacob E. Howard attended this meeting that led to the calling of the first Republican convention in Philadelphia in 1856.

General John C. Fremont, history says, was the first presidential choice of the party, but although he received a majority of the the popular vote, he failed in election because Buchanan had a majority in the electorial college. Four years later Abraham Lincoln, the emancipator, swept the party into office.

Just who built Bronson hall, which will give way to a new 13-story office building and home of the Jackson City bank, is not known. For several years it had been used by a department store although the upper floors, where many famous meetings besides the initial Republican rally were held, were still intact, and contained most of the original furnishings. The hall at one time was one of the most popular assembly places in the city.

When Bronson hall first came into national prominence two great parties, the Democrats and Whigs, were in existence, and an attempt was being made to form a third, or "Free Soil Party." In December, 1853, the Michigan Free Soil Democratic Central committee issued a call for a Free Soil party state convention to be held in Jackson on February 22, 1854. Influential Whigs were invited to the meeting, which is said to have been held in Bronson hall. Henry Barnes of Detroit was named president, and George Fitch of Kalamazoo secretary of the gathering.

SEEK TO SAVE CARGO OF AUTOS ON ICE BOUND SHIP

Underwriters are seeking means to salvage 200 automobiles in the hold of the steamer City of Bangor, encrusted in the ice of Keweenaw Point. The Bangor, owned by the Nicholson Universal Steamship company of Detroit, went aground November 30 while en route from Detroit to Duluth. The cargo, consigned to Minnesota automobile dealers, was due in Duluth December 1.

Twelve machines are frozen to the deck of the ship. Those in the hold are unharmed. It will be necessary to break the ice from the ship and then build a road nine miles through heavy timber, wide enough to permit drawing the automobiles on sleds without overhanging trees damaging the paint on the automobile bodies.

DETROIT AIR FIRM BIDS FOR CHICAGO-FRISCO MAIL

The Stout Air Service of Detroit was one of the six bidders for the trans-continental and overnight Chicago-New York air mail contracts when the government opened bids at Washington. The Stout bid was for the Chicago-San Francisco section. Ford all-metal planes would be used, should the contract be given the Detroit firm.

CIRCUS MAN GIVES INSIDE STORY ABOUT BUYING SKINNED TREE

Buying shade trees frequently is a part of the business of a circus owner, according to John W. MacDonald of Detroit, who has been with the "big tops" many years. Often circus wagons knock the bark off fine shade trees between the unloading point and the lot where the circus shows. The owners of these trees usually demand as damages more than the trees are worth. In such cases the circus man orders the head teamster to hitch up several horses and remove the tree.

"That threat generally settles the whole affair, because few persons are willing to part with their trees," said Mr. MacDonald. "One man who had demanded $500 from me for damage to his maple tree accepted $5 when I told my teamster to get eight horses and take the tree."

HAY SURPLUS IN U S. IS REDUCED

Half the marketable surplus of timothy has been marketed to date this season compared with 45 per cent a year ago and 30 per cent at this time in 1924, according to reports received by the United States department of agriculture. About the same proportion of alfalfa and prairie has been moved as at this time last year but on account of the smaller surplus of these hays the tonnage is doubtless smaller than for the same time last season. Moderate amounts of hay are moving into the usual consuming areas, chiefly for dairy and industrial purposes, since farmers in these sections had good supplies of local hays. Dealers' stocks in consuming territory average a little smaller than usual at this time, reflecting the slackened inquiry but some dealers are buying small amounts of hay for deferred shipment.

Incinding the carry over from last season the domestic supply of hay amounts to less than 108,000,000 tons compared with 114,000,000 a year ago and 125,000,000 tons two years back. The estimate of the 1926 crop is placed at 96,361,000 tons against 98,411,000 in 1925, but farm stocks of hay on May 1, 1926, were estimated at 11,700,000 tons against nearly 15,700,000 tons the previous year. Since the late spring in 1926 caused usually heavy feeding after May 1, the carry over this year is doubtless smaller than the figure for May 1 would indicate.

Slightly more timothy was harvested this year than last. 10,273,000 tons against 9,404,000 in 1925, but only 20,511,000 tons of mixed timothy and clover were secured compared with 21,267,000 tone last year. Clover production also continued its downward trend with 10,185,000 tons against 11,060,000 for 1925. Alfafla harvest of 27,496,000 tons was slightly unler last year's figure of 28,439,000 tons, but the crop of annual legumes increased from 2,593,000 tons in 1925 to 3,796,000 tons this year. This season's harvest of grain, hay and miscellaneous hays, such as millot, Sudan grass, etc., is larger than a year ago.

Farm prices for all kinds of tame hay in the United States are practically the same as a year ago, averaging only 15 cents a ton higher, while farm prices of wild hay average about $1.50 a ton higher this season, reflecting the reduced crop of this hay. Prices on an average are slightly higher than last year in the northeastern section of the United States and in the west-north central states, but in nearly all other sections they are lower, much lower in some areas.

AUTOS ARE BLAMED FOR SHORTENED LIFE U. S. PAPER MONEY

The automobile, which has materially boosted the American accidental death rate in the last ten years, likewise is blamed for the shortening of the life of paper money.

Paper currency lasts about half as long as before the war, putting the government to a great additional expense in keeping this type of money in circulation. The question was referred to the United States Bureau of Standards for the development of a tougher paper for money.

Experts say that the handling of paper money at automobile service stations is directly responsible for the short life of the currency. It was pointed out that frequently the hands of the service station employes are covered with oil and grease and that these ingredients, soaking into the paper money, soon render it useless as currency, sending it back to the United States treasury for re-issue.

IONIA SCHOOL BUILT IN 1870 IS CONDEMNED

The old Jefferson school building at Ionia, which was constructed in 1870 and was serving as an annex to the new Jefferson building, was abandoned, following condemnation by a contractor who was employed to inspect the structure after a protest had been made by parents about two weeks ago. Half-day sessions were started to care for the pupils in the old building. Plans are being made by the board of education for a bond issue of $50,000 to build an addition to the new Jefferson school.

BOY CATCHES FOX WITHBONFIRE AND A PAIR OF TONGS

Lucas Millenbach, a Boy Scout of Houghton, caught a red fox several days ago by means of a bonfire and a pair of tongs.

While skiing in woods near his home Millenbach came on the trail of the fox. He tracked the animal and caught sight of it as it took refuge in a large pine stump. Knowing that he could not capture the animal alone, he kindled a fire near the stump to keep the fox inside while he went for help.

With the aid of his brothers, Millenbach caught the fox around the neck with a pair of tongs and after considerable tussle, pulled it out of its refuge and placed it in a bag.

Millenbach plans to tame the captive.

Thirty petitions have been filed with County Drain Commissioner Daniel F. Sullivan, of Raisinville township, asking for drains in Monroe county. The proposed drains would be about eight miles long and would be located in practically every section of the county. The cost is estimated at between $250,000 and $300,000.

727 FIRE DEAD DUE TO SILK'S STATIC

Of the 15,000 persons who perished by fire in the United States last year, 787 of them, mostly women, died because they did not know the simple law of physics that two silken objects rubbed together will generate sparks of electrictiy.

This was one of the interesting and startling array of facts presented to a group of Michigan fire fighters and Minute Men of the Detroit Board of Commerce by Richard Vernon, of Chicago.

Vernon, who is manager of the fire prevention bureau of the Windy City, was one of a number of speakers who told what is being done, and what should be done, by business men of the United States, as a business proposition alone, to try to stop the annual fire loss in the United States amounting to $790,000,000 and 15,000 lives.

"Every re that fibreaks out in Detroit has in it the possibilities of a conflagration that will wipe the city from the face of the earth," declared Sherwood Brockwell, fire marshal of North Carolina.

"You business men should keep that fact in mind every time you hear a firebell ring or a siren sounded. What you need to do is teach prevention rather than fire control, for although you may sit back with the thought that insurance covers everything, any of you who ever suffered from a fire knows that the best of insurance only begins to pay the loss."

BILL WOULD PLACE BEARS ON PAR WITH DOGS FOR SLAUGHTER

The Michigan state legislature will be out gunning for black bear this session. And the black bear, which in 1925 gained the protection of a friendly legislature in the form of a game law prohibiting its destruction except during the deer season, may lead a dog's life of it, if the present session is favorable to the proposed measures.

According to the law, dogs may be killed if they violate the common rules of politeness and trespass on or destroy any citizen's property. The proposed measure would class black bears with dogs, instead of with deer, as is the case at present.

Mrs. Morey's Death

Mrs. Phoebe Morey, widow of the late Amos Morey, passed to the Beyond from the home of her daughter, Mrs. Vining Barker, Saturday last at 5:30 p. m. the direct cause of her death being a fractured hip, but she had been ailing for a number of years.

Phoebe Rogers was born in April 1839, near Lyons, Wayne county, New York., and at the early age of six years emigrated with her parents to Wheatland township where she resided until her marriage to Amos Morey which occurred in December 1855. Her husband passing away in 1912.

To this union had been born 5 children, one dying in infancy and the 4 who survive her are Doctors Montie A. and Frank Morey of Chicago, two daughters, Mrs. Vining Barker of this vicinity and Mrs. Mable Chapman of Lansing, five grand-children and seven great-grand children.

She was a faithful member of the Methodist church, a lady of benevolent character and highly respected by all who knew her. Much of her time of late has been spent with her sons in Chicago.

Funeral services were conducted at the Barker home Tuesday Feb. 1 at 1;30 p. m. by Rev. Herbert E. Wylie of the North Adams Methodist church, and interment took place in the Dibble cemetery east of this village.

The Time of Diphtheria Is Past

We used to think of that dread disease Diphtheria with shudders but the day is past when it will be no more annoying than the common run of diseases such as scarlet fever, influenza, typhoid, etc. Both diphtheria and small pox have lost their teeth in Michigan since the board of health took a few precautions to protect the public. The discovery of anti-toxins solved the problem of taking care of the diseases. Today if a person is obliged for any cause to work over a diphtheria or small pox person a dose or two of these toxins is sufficient to immunize the nurses thoroughly. The city of Hillsdale along about this time of year used to be the hot bed of both these diseases, but one seldom ever hears of a case there now. There have been some improvements in water conditions it is true also the milk supply has been looked after.

Who can forget the sordid details of the terrible conditions which used to occur in diphtheria cases when persons would sicken and die and no one would care for them? How the dead were taken out and buried at midnight so as to not expose any other people.

DEER TRAPPER TO SHIP TO U. S. PARK

The initial shipment of deer to the municipal and private parks throughout the United States, from the Cleveland-Cliffs Iron company's private game preserve on Grand Island, was made last week.

The work of trapping the deer alive and preparing them for shipment is conducted under the direction of Herbert Tisdale. During January- February and March of each year, approximately 50 animals are caught in the forests that cover the entire preserve and are shipped to various points in the country.

The wild life preserve on Grand Island is the largest private deer park in the United States. Covered with miles of virgin timber land and flanked on three sides by high perpendicular bluffs that overlook the blue waters of Lake Superior, it is a scenic attraction both beautiful and inspiring.

Rich in Indian legend and the early life of Michigan's pioneers, it has gradually come to be recognized as one of the foremost scenic magnets of northern Michigan, with its 13,600 acres of forests and rocks, and lakes and tumbling streams.

Trapping and shipping the deer that roam the forests of the island is done with the consent of the Michigan department of conservation.

The method used in catching the deer is simple and does not injure the animals. Boxes, four feet wide by eight feet long, with trap doors at each end are used. Placed at favorable deer herding places and baited with tempting morsels, which appear to have an irresistible lure for the antlered lord of the wilderness and his fleet footed mate, the trap doors spring shut as soon as one of the animals enters the box to partake of the spread.

The box is then removed to a large corral where the doors of the cage are raised and the deer liberated in the large enclosure. The animals are kept for several weeks in the corral and are fed daily by the game-keepers and otherwisce accustomed to being in close contact with man, who in their wild state, is their arch enemy.

That the system used is both humane and practical is evidenced by the fact that of more than 500 deer shipped during the last 10 years, only one was lost.

LAND SUIT IS OVER WILL PROBATED 27 YEARS

A land title suit involving a will made 27 years ago, property valued at $80,000 and a family fight, was tried before Judge Neil E. Reid in Macomb county circuit court.

Minnie Seelbinder, Los Angeles, and Mary Stern and Emma Miller, of Erin township, tried to lay claim to land willed their stepmother and three step brothers and sisters 27 years ago. The stepbrothers and sisters are Frank Bliss, Amiel Bliss and Loraine Nader.

According to testimony, C. Bliss died in 1899, after having been married twice, leaving three children by his first wife, and three children by his second wife. According to the terms of his will, the three children received $1,000 each subsequent to his death and his widow and three other children were given his home and 40 acres of land in Erin township. At that time the land was worth about $3,000.

The three children by the second wife kept the place, however, and the value increased to $80,000. Now the three children by the first wife contend that they have a right to a share of the land.

LAST LOG SCHOOL VACANT LANDMARK IN HURON COUNTY

The last of the old log school houses of Huron County and about one of the last in the state, is now but a vacant landmark. For many years students of Sheridan township received their early education in the little log structure. It was finally decided to replace the old school house with a new and modern structure. But for reasons of sentiment, the old log cabin school was not razed. The old school building and the new stand side by side.

It is planned to preserve tha log school building and turn it over to the state. So far no state funds are available for this purpose. The log school house has also been offered for sale, but no bids have been received.

BETTER FARMING IN UPPER PENINSULA IS GOAL OF STATE

For the first consecutive year Michigan State college, early in the spring, will lend its resources to the upper peninsula in promoting a campaign for "better agriculture," co-operating with the development bureau, the railroads and the state department of agriculture.

The latest "drive" will be carried on by means of a soil, seeds and crops train, and will take place the last week in March and the first two weeks in April. Immediately following the appearance of the special train, crop contests will be started. State college experts will aid particularly in giving information to farmers on means of obtaining clean, certified seeds to replace those damaged by heavy rains in 1926. The state department of agriculture has pledged its support in providing supplies of tested seeds, soils survey reports and possibly specialists to complete the personnel of the train, if it proves necessary to add to the original staff.

The train will consist of a coach which may serve as an auditorium or lecture car; an express car for exhibition purposes; a combination sleeper and diner, to serve as living quarters; a smaller express car, which will contain varieties of tested seeds for display.

GIVES FLAG SEIZED IN WAR OF 1865

An interesting momento of the Civil war—an old silk flag seized from the "Louisiana Tigers," one of the strongest fighting units in the confederate army—is to be added to the collections of the museum department of the Port Huron public library.

The flag is the property of Orville Cowles, G. A. R. veteran, who served in Company H, Fourth Michigan infantry, and was given to him by his father.

"A confederate lieutenant was about to take prisoner a disabled northern soldier, when my father sprang forward and pointed his gun at the officer," Cowles says in describing the taking of the flag. "The officer surrendered and my father tore the colors from his staff and presented his prisoner and the flag to General Rosecrans. The general returned the emblem to my father."

The bag measuring 54 by 38 inches, is made of scarlet silk with tan border. It bears 13 stars, one for each state which joined in the rebellion, also the inscriptions "Elk Horn" and "Oak Hills," the places from which the regiment was formed.

OLD BRICK MAKING TOOLS ARE ADDED TO FORD'S COLLECTION

Henry Ford has added a complete outfit of brick-laying machinery and tools to his Wayside Inn equipment, and Thomas Arden, Hyannis, Mass. Rotarian, has a brand new one-ton Ford truck, and in actual cash it cost neither one a cent.

Mr. Harden has a brick-making establishment just outside of Hyannis and one day a tall, slim, middle-aged chap stepped out of a big car and walked into the office. He introduced himself and said he wanted to buy some brick-making machinery to add to his collection of Wayside Inn.

Mr. Adren said he thought he could provide the equipment wanted and took Mr. Ford outside to show him what he had. Mr. Ford was satisfied and inquired for the prices, and was told there was no price because the machinery was useless to the owner and just lying around. Mr. Arden even promised to have his men load the machinery and tools on a truck, saying: "My men will be around here anyhow, and we'll find some time to do it."

The manufacturer went back to his big car. A few days later a brand new one-ton Ford truck was driven up to Mr. Arden's office door and with it came a receipted bill of sale.

STATE NORMAL HEAD TO ADDRESS "McMURRYS"

President Charles McKenny of the Michigan State Normal college has been asked to deliver an address on the McMurrys' noted American educators, at a celebration the latter part of February at Peabody college, Peabody, Tenn., in recognition of 50 years of teaching by Charles A. McMurry. The president has recently been appointed chairman of a committee on summer exchanges of professors in teachers' colleges, by President H. C. Minnick of the American Association of Teachers' colleges.

There are 140,000 generic names in use in the scientific world. Between 1500 and 2000 new names are created annually.

ANN ARBOR TO GET ANCIENT MURALS

The Villa of the Mysteries, its existence long known to but a few officials of the Italian government and a handful of archaeologists, is about to be opened to the public at last and to some degree Prof. Francis W. Kelsey, director of the University of Michigan's Near East Research, is responsible for the crashing of official barriers. If Prof. Kelsey can not be credited with the actual discovery of the Villa of the Mysteries and its marvellous murals, at least, according to a recent issue of "Il Giornale D'Italia," he has done more than another in awakening Italy to the value of its treasure.

In a brief note received at Ann Arbor, Prof. Kelsey states that the copies of the Villa decorations won the admiration of the King and Queen and the statement of art criticsm that they ably depict the finest murals yet uncovered among the ruins of the ancient city. Due to public insistence, the government is about to raise the bans of 16 years, construct roads to the site, take all steps to insure the preservation of the work and throw the Villa open to visitors. Of greater interest is the rumor that, with permission of the Italian government the copies may be brought to Ann Arbor and used to adorn the walls of the $900,000 University museum now under constructions.

It was in 1910 that the Swiss innkeeper, Item, strolling about the neighborhood, thought he saw on the estate of Signora Elizabeth Cargiulo the surface evidence of buried antiquities and, obtaining the owner's permission, he began to dig in the soil which had lain undisturbed for 19 centuries.

He had proceeded far enough with his work to indicate a genuine archaerological "find" when, according to Bacchiani, who expresses his artistic indignation, the officials of the government descended upon the site, paid a huge sum for it, erected stout wooden barriers all about, built a custodian's lodge, arranged for a day and night watchman—and proceeded to do nothing more for 16 years.

But guards, as the traveler quickly comes to know, are ever amenable to the crackle of a crisp note or the chink of coins. Thus those who passed the barriers returned to tell of descending into a vast dim room along three sides of which ran a panel, 52 feet by 10 and on which, life-size, there were posed 29 marvelous figures. A background of brilliant red, almost luminous in its intensity, created a peculiar sense of life and movement.

It was the Villa of the Mysteries, not because its location was long withheld from the public nor yet because the true purpose of the building and the significance of the paintings are still a matter for learned discussion and considerable doubt. But archaeologists are now fairly well agreed that here was the temple of an ancient and forbidden cult, concealed perhaps the dense grove or thicket and that the painting represents the initiation of a neophyte into the rites or "mysteries" of the order.

Certainly the ceremonial procession of frieze, colors as brilliant as though just painted, would seem to bear out this theory.

$13,813 STATE SHARE IN U. S. FOREST ROAD FUND

Michigan is to receive $13,813 from the $7,500,000 road fund for national forests which has been appropriated by congress as a part of the federal aid road act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928.

The fund was divided by congress into two portions, one of $4,500,000 for the survey, construction and maintenance of forest roads of primary importance to states and communities; and the other of $3,000,000 for development of roads of primary importance for the protection, administration and utilization of the national forests themselves and necessary for develompent of the resources upon which the communities within the national forests are depended.

Michigan gets $11,430 from the $3,000,000 subdivision and $2,383 from the $4,500,000.

COURT TO DECIDE IF CITY HAS RIGHT TO LIBRARY BUILDING

Whether Pontiac can own the building in which the city library has been housed for three years is a point that will have to be determined in the Oakland County Circuit Court. The library, formerly owned by the Ladies' Library Association of Pontiac, was presented to the city by the association and has been conducted by the city for three years but without any ownership of the two-story brick building in which it is housed. There is an obstacle in the way of a reversionary clause in the deed to the property obtained by the association from the estate of Byron G. Stout, and it is to clear this "cloud" that a bill has been filed in Circuit Court by the Library Association.

When Byron G. Stout, died in 1896 he presented the Library Association with money enough to buy a site and build a library. There was a clause in the deed that in the event the library association ever used the building for other than library purposes it should revert to the Stout heirs. Pontiac then had a population of 5,000, and has since grown to more than 50,000.

For a quarter of a century the Ladies' Library Association operated the library as a semi-public institution, but it was finally decided to turn the institution over to the city. The court will be asked to determine whether the association has a right to deed the property to the city but with the understanding it is always to be used for library purposes.

WINTER ANGLERS HOUSED AND WARM

Eskimos may continue to confine their fishing to the summer months. Michigan anglers will stand pat in their refusal to let winter interfere with their favorite diversions. A real angler never gets cold feet.

Little things like sub-zero weather and 18 inches of ice don't discourage a dyed-in-the-wool Michigan fisherman. In fact, ice is as much a part of his winter fishing game as his hooks and lines. The thicker the ice, the better he likes it, provided the lake or stream in which he purposes to fish doesn't freeze to the bottom. And as for sub-zero zyphyrs, they're perfectly all right, too, especially if the breeze is from the south.

Michigan fish like their south breeze, winter and summer. Take the word of an experienced angler for that.

Stretching for miles over Lake St. Clair's ice on each side of the mouth of the Clinton River below Mt. Clemens are hundreds of little houses that might be mistaken for chicken coops. On a fair day nearly every shack will be attended by an automobile. The owner of the car isn't visible. He is sitting comfortably in the coop, fishing through the ice.

The coops are heated by small oil stoves, and the occupant can fish as comfortably as he might from a boat on a warm spring day. There are no mosquitos to bother. The interior of most of the coops is painted black, to hide the angler. But with the light through the ice from all sides of the fishing house, the winter fisher can watch his bait and the fish that try to steal it, even at a depth of 10 or 12 feet. He actually sees his "bites." Most of the coops are equipped with sled runners so they may be towed to the fishing grounds, up-ended over a hole in the ice all winter, then upset and towed back to shore when the lake starts to break up in spring.

HERE NS SURE CURE FOR THAT CROWING ROOSTER

Roosters that crow during the night are a nuisance, but this objectionable feature may be easily overcome. One may either place the roost near the roof of the chicken house or stretch a piece of wire netting above the roosts and from this suspend lathing, allowing the ends to dangle about nine inches above the resting-poles, about four inches apart. The rooster then will strike its head when stretching its neck to crow.

TWO WOLVERINES GET CARNEGI MEDAL

Two Michigan men have received citations from the Carnegie Hero Fund commission for acts of bravery. Walter J. Brockmiller, 24 years old, of 608 South Cedar avenue, Owosso, who saved a child from drowning, and Redmond M. Burr, 43 years old, of 320 South Fifth avenue, Ann Arbor, who saved a man from being killed by a train, have each been cited for bronze medal awards.

Four years ago Redmund Burr performed an act of singular heroism. Now, after a series of misunderstandings, he is receiving the award for this act.

Burr was returning from a fair in the northern part of the state when the action that lead to the award of the Carnegie award occurred. He had stopped to change trains at Holland and noticed William A. Weed, 71 years old, standing at the edge of the tracks looking at some crated dogs there. Obviously deaf, the man failed to hear the whistles of the approaching train or of the men standing about who yelled at him. Just as the train was about to hit him, Burr hurled himself across the track in front of the engine and threw the old man to one side. The train narrowly missed both of them.

The medal awarded Walter J. Brockmiller is in recognition of his risking his life in rescuing Daisy Sayan, six years old, from 15 feet of water in the Shiawassee river on May 20, 1924.

Brockmiller and Harry Coakes were fishing near the Ann Arbor railroad bridge and saw a number of little girls go out on the bridge and start throwing stones and sticks into the stream. A moment later, the Sayan girl lost her blance and fell into the stream.

Brockmiller ran to the bridge and jumped in after her, without taking off his heavy hip boots or any of his clothing.

KALAMAZOO FARMER IS 1926 CHAMP AS POTATO GROWER

Michigan's champion potato grower in 1926 was a Kalamazoo County farmer who obtained a yield of 423 bushels an acre, or almost four times the average production of the State.

J. C. Redpath was the grower of this big crop. It was announced that 34 farmers in the state had qualified in 1926 for honorary membership in the Michigan 300 Bushel Potato Club. Redpath headed the list which was as follows:

William Slough, Ellsworth, 422 bushels; Julius Grindsteun, Maple City, 421; D. H. Brat, Charlevoix, 412; F. M. Shepard, Alba, 407; R. C. Bennett, Alba, 402; Harry Reiley, Ballaire, 401; William Greenman, Bellaire, 401; William Hansen, Lakeview, 400; M. E. FIRST STATE COLLEGE GRAD KILLED IS HONORED

A bronze tablet honoring William Ricker Johnston, which the East Lansing American Legion post will contribute, is the first of the memorials to famous Michigan war heroes to be promised in response to a request from Michigan State college military officials for tablets and statuettes which will be placed in the new armory on its completion.

William Ricker Johnston was the first state college graduate to be killed in the World war. Other tablets will honor generals and high-ranking military officials from this state who lost their lives in battle.

CONDEMNS KILLING OF PORCUPINES

John W. Ireland, game warden of Wayne county, while making a survey of Michigan's northern forest areas recently, came upon numerous porcupines ruthlessly shot and let lie by hunters.

"It's a perfect outrage to shoot a porcupine and I do not see what sport there is in it. Surely the hunter who shoots one of these animals can not be called a sportsman. He does not want the creature for its flesh and only destroys wild life which is so rapidly decreasing," said Ireland.

Anyone who has ever seen in the woods this quadruped dorent, the porcupine, with its coarse hair so thickly interspersed with those erect, quill-like spines, especially on the rump and tail, which is used as a means of defense, will always remember the creature as just a quiet member of our woodland friends. The genus includes a large number of species, varying greatly in size and habits, but the body of our Michigan porcupine is about two feet long and weighs from fifteen to twenty pounds.

They are very solitary in habits, and live chiefly on bark, roots and other vegetable substances, for which they search at night. They seem to take great delight in chewing the bark from trees, which can be called their only bad habit. During the day they usually lie concealed in hollow tree trunks, but late in the afternoon they fare forth and investigate any unusual noise or moving object, making peculiar squealing noises as they shamble about.

Nature has bestowed the quill as the porcupine's only protection. The point of the spine is as sharp as a needle and as strong. They are so fashioned that when the porcupine curls up the entire body is protected.

To color and flavor apples, either baked or in a sauce, put a few red cinnamon candies, such as children call "red hots," into the water in which the fruit is cooked.

If you want a jelly to set quickly the best plan is to dissolve the gelatin in a small quantity of hot water and then add cold water to make up the amount.

RIDER-OWNERS IS INTERURBAN PLAN

The experiment of operating a suburban railway company, every share of the stock in which is owned by the residents of the communities which it serves, is to be attempted by promoters of a new company to provide transportation service for the districts along the old Grand Rapids, Holland & Chicago Railway company's line as far as Jenison.

A campaign will be launched soon to get every family in Burlingame, Galewood, Simbrook, Ivanrest, Hamilton, Grandville and Jenison to subscribe for one or more shares of stock in the concern which, it has been suggested, will be known as the Grand Rapids Suburban Railway company.

Interurban service was cut off a couple of months ago when the property of the Grand Rapids, Holland & Chicago Railway company, which operated an electric line from Grand Rapids to Saugatuck by way of Holland, was sold under a foreclosure order.

$50,000 AWARDED FOR DOCTOR'S DEATH IN AUTO

The estate of Dr. Charles L. Kyner of Detroit was awarded $50,000 damages by a jury in Judge Guy a Miller's court in a damage suit brought by the Union Trust company, as administrator, against Robert Herndon, real estate dealer, the Dearborn Hills Golf club, and Arthur L. DeClerque, an employe of the club.

Dr. Kyner was fatally injured on December 7, 1923, when Herndon's automobile, in which he was riding with DeClerque as driver, struck a telephone pole and ran into a ditch.

The petition stated that Dr. Kyner was being solicited by DeClerque and Herndon to join the golf club. Is asked $100,000 damages.

GOLD FISH FREEZE DETROIT WOMAN IS HELD FOR CRUELTY

Mrs. Hattie Shields, 35, of Detroit is charged with being cruel to animals, including pet goldfish. On December 6, police say, Mrs. Shields, a widow, was suddenly called to Hersey, Mich., to attend the funeral of her prospective father-in-law. Having only five minutes to catch the train, she chained up her two dogs and her cat and left her pet goldfish in the bowl. Five days later she returned. According to police, one dog gave a dying sigh as Mrs. Shields entered the house and the other dog and cat had to be shot. Meanwhile the poor goldfish had become preserved in a cake of ice inside its bowl.

AIRMEN FEED TRIO HELD ON ICE TRAPPED BOAT

At the mercy of the winds and waves of Lake Michigan, three fishermen marooned on the tiny tug Imperial as she lay in the grip of a huge drifting ice field, 10 miles off Michigan City, turned to the skies for succor.

The sheet of ice holding the tug fast was surrounded by open water and beyond that ice packed again, preventing the men from reaching shore and making them dependent on airplanes for their food and other supplies.

When the Ford plane roared over the Imperial, the marooned fishermen dashed out and waved their arms. Their hunger was evidenced by the avidity with which they fell upon the first bag of food to strike the ice and began to devour its contents.

A non-inflammable gasoline known as "white spirit," has been developed in France for airplane engines. Tests have shown that the substance will not catch fire.

"Build Your Own Forest" Slogan Of Camp Fire Girls for 1927

Camp Fire Girls of New York start on tree planting expedition

No more forest famines in the communities where Camp Fire Girls hold forth. This national organization of girls, with 170,000 members, has proclaimed 1927, Tree Year. Every group all over the country is to make itself responsible for the planting of a certain number of trees, either a "Camp Fire Forest", on property belonging or loaned to the organization, or on avenues, parks or highways belonging to the municipality. Not only will the girls plant the trees, but they will make themselves responsible for their upkeep.

"The impetus for this program", says Mr. Lester F. Scott, National Executive of Camp Fire, "came from various groups which had locally undertaken the planting of Camp Fire forests. In Grand Rapids Camp Fire girls planted 10,000 trees last spring on a bleak stretch of land, and a similar project was carried out in Cleveland. While every group cannot hope to plant so large a forest as this, there is no local organization which will not make an appreciable contribution to the beautification of the community."

In addition to the actual tree planting, there is a year round program of educational tree activities. These will include learning the names and natures of different trees and all pertaining to their planting, preservation and growth; seed collecting; marking of trees, tree mapping, the eradication of insects damaging to tree life and the cooperation in all efforts made toward forest fire prevention.

State and local foresters and all organizations interested in conservation of national resources are expected to cooperate in this program of the Camp Fire Girls. The national committee sponsoring the project are: Dr. Edward T. Allen, of Portland; Dr. Harold Bryant, Berkeley; Warren Bullock, New York; Ovid M. Butler, Washington; Mrs. Litian T. Conway, Washington; Dr. Henry S. Graves, New Haven; Col. W. B. Greeley, Washington; Paul Kelleter, Syracuse; Prof. B. O. Longyear, Fort Collins; Col. Edwin L. BILL WOULD PLACE BEARS ON PAR WITH DOGS FOR SLAUGHTER

The Michigan state legislature will be out gunning for black bear this session. And the black bear, which in 1925 gained the protection of a friendly legislature in the form of a game law prohibiting its destruction except during the deer season, may lead a dog's life of it, if the present session is favorable to the proposed measures.

According to the law, dogs may be killed if they violate the common rules of politeness and trespass on or destroy any citizen's property. The proposed measure would class black bears with dogs, instead of with deer, as is the case at present.

MASTODON TOOTH, 100,000 YEARS OLD IS FOUND IN CLINTON

The tooth of a mastodon, measuring more than seven inches across, was unearthed recently two miles west of St. Johns, Mich., by Clayton Snyder. The prehistoric monster is said by Michigan State College authorities to have been extinct for 1000,000 years or more.

The tooth was found while excavating for a ditch near a creek bed in Clinton County. It was turned up from 10 feet below the surface of the ground.

Nothing is wonderful after you see it once.

STATE IS NINTH IN CO-OP MARKETING

Michigan is ranked by the United States Department of Agriculture as the ninth most important state in the development of agricultural co-operation.

Approximately 60 per cent of the co-operative marketing activity in agriculture since 1915 has taken place in 10 states, says the department. These states are, in the order of their relative importance, Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, Illinois, California, Kansas, Nebraska, North Dakota, Michigan and New York.

Sixty-three per cent of the functioning associations for the 10 years, 1915 to 1925, were located in these states. Almost one-half of the total membership of co-operatives fell within the boundaries of these states and the associations credited to them handled more than 60 per cent of the total co-operative business for the 10 years ending with 1925.

During the last five of the ten years a number of the southern states in which large cotton and tobacco associations had been formed, enjoyed a truly remarkable growth in the matter of co-operative activity. However, the development was not sufficient to put them in the first 10 for the 10-year period.

A rough estimate as to the total business handled by the co-operatives in the 10 leading states for the 10-year period, according to the department, is $9,000,000,000.

OOSTERBAAN IS TONGUE TWISTER BUT FANS LIKE IT

How does it feel to be the father of one of the greatest college athletes in the country?

B. G. Oosterbaan of Muskegon says it is a grand and glorious feeling. Mr. Oosterbaan's name has been made familiar throughout the country by the feats of his son, Bennie Oosterbaan, captain-elect of the Michigan foot ball eleven. The father, who has been prominent in Muskegon affairs for many years, today is known largely as "Bennie's father." But he says he doesn't mind.

Mr. Oosterbaan worked at the trade as a baker until he was named a justice of the peace. Later he became postmaster and served eight years under the Wilson administration. Today, he is secretary of the Muskegon Merchants' bureau.

Muskegon was long familiar with the tongue twisting name when the Friedman to Oosterbaan forward pass first attracted attention in the fall of 1924. And while the name has been blazed across sport pages and over the radio since 1924, Muskegon still gets a smile from the efforts of those unfamiliar with the Dutch names to pronounce it.

U. S. ASKED TO TAKE HAND IN TESTING POTATO SEED

At the request of the Potato Association of America, of which Prof. Henry C. Moore, of Michigan State College, is president, Rep. Roy Woodruff, of Michigan, has introduced a bill to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to test seeding and improved strains of potatoes to determine their productive ability, immunity to disease, varietal purity and trueness to name. It would empower the Department of Agriculture to provide facilities in different producing sections to determine the commercial merits of seeding potatoes offered for sale.

This work would do much, it is believed, to clarify the confusion over potato names, especially where certain varieties are offered for sale under several different names.

FOUNDRY WORKER AGED 69, FATHER OF 26 CHILDREN

In Napoleon Ladere, 69 years old, father of 26 children, the youngest of whom is but two months old, Mancelona has a citizen who would have brought delight to the heart of Teddy Roosevelt. Ladere is a fireman in the Antrim Iron company foundry.

One of his most pleasant experiences occurred last Fourth of July, when he was host of his entire family and after dinner watched a half dozen of his daughters hustle through the dishes.

"Pola," as he is known familiarly, has been married twice. His first wife was Hula Ely, of Saginaw, by whom he had 14 children. Two years after her death, he married Effie McEllis, his present wife, by whom 12 children were added to the family.

$118,627 AWARDED WOMAN SUING CITY ON $894 INVESTMENT

The equivalent of about 13,000 per cent of her investment is awarded to Mrs. Lillian Stiglitz of Detroit under a verdict in a suit against the city of Detroit, over property on which she had bought the tax titles. The verdict for $118,627.12, will be appealed to the supreme court.

The amount represents damages Mrs. Stiglitz was adjudged to have suffered as the result of the city's refusal in 1924 to accept tax title certificates from her and in return give her 99-year leaseholds on the property specified. It was computed on the basis of what the long lease would have meant in terms of cash.

Under the old city charter, if tax titles sold by the city were not redeemed within one year the purchaser was entitled to such a lease. The new charter, adopted June 27, 1918, set 18 months as the time of grace, and later the time was extended still further.

Prior to the adoption of the new charter, Mrs. Stiglitz obtained 15 title certificates, valued at $894.63, from persons who had bought them from the city, but it was after the adoption that she called upon the city to give her the leases.

The city's contention was that a no state law or no ordinance provides for damages in such a case, the plaintiff's only remedy was to compel the city by mandamus proceedings to surrender the leases.

STATE DAIRY HERDS SHOW IMPROVEMENT IN MILK PRODUCTION

Further improvement in the efficiency of state institutional dairy herds was made in 1926, the annual report of the State Department of Agriculture reveals.

The average milk production per cow for the 882 head in state herds during the year was 10,571.3 pounds, compared with 10,081.8 in 1925, showing an individual gain of approximately 500 pounds. This increase was effected by weeding out marginal and low producing animals, the department explains. All except the Pontiac State Hospital herd showed an increase in average production per cow over the previous year. All of the institutional herds were in cow testing associations.

There are 13 institutional herds, and six of these average more than 10,000 pounds of milk per cow for the year. The Traverse City State Hospital led with an average of 13,001.8 pounds. The Ionia Reformatory was a close second, Marquette Prison third, Ionia State Hospital fourth, Newberry Hospital fifth and the Lapeer Home and Training School sixth.

The herds at Jackson Prison, Kalamazoo Hospital, Lansing Boys School, Pontiac Hospital, Flint School for the Deaf, and the Howell Sanatorium averaged well above 9,000 pounds. They ranked in the order named. The Wahjamega Farm Colony herd, with 7,935 pounds, was the lowest.

The greatest gain in production over 1925 was at Jackson Prison, which increased its output per cow from 7,238 pounds of 9,997.8 pounds, rising from twelfth position in 1925 to seventh in 1926. Pontiac hospital slipped from sixth place in 1925 to tenth position among the herds in 1926.

BIG BUSINESS MEETS IN DETROIT NEXT MAY

Detroit will be the host of "big business" next May, when the fourteenth national foreign trade convention meets to discuss problems of world trade. James A. Farrell, president of the United States Steel corporation, will preside at the meetings which will be held May 25, 26 and 27.

In explaining why Detroit was chosen for the important meeting, O. K. Davis, secretary of the National Foreign Trade council, said:

"For the first time in six years the foreign traders are meeting in a great industrial community away from the seacoast."

U. S. TAX HARVEST IN NICHIGAN HUGE

According to statistics of income tax collections made public by the Internal Revenue Bureau, 1923 was a bumper year in Michigan, both for individuals and for corporations.

The total collected by the federal government in Michigan in income taxes during 1926 was $147,686,071. This was an increase of $45,150,257 over the amount collected in 1925, when the total was $102,535,814. The contribution of only one other state, New York, underwent a similar increase, the collections in that state mounting from $528,796,905 in 1925 to $618,415,054 in 1926. Florida, however, showed a remarkable proportionate growth, collections there jumping from $16,803,149 in 1925 to $46,6.8,668 in 1926.

The greater part of the prenomenal growth in Michigan's contribution to the Federal treasury however, was due to the corporation tax. The 13.5 per cent levied on the incomes of the Michigan corporatons in 1926 produced the record sum of $108,869,297, as compared with only $64,981,168 in 1925. Personal income tax payments in Michigan amounted to $38,816,774, as compared with $37,554,645 the preceding year.

Total collections under the federal income tax through the country during 1926 amounted to $2,172,127,321. The figure for 1925 was $1,825,704 135, the increase being $346,423,185.

Due partly to the advance in the rate from 12.5 to 13.5 per cent, which was in effect throughout the calendar year 1926, the corporation tax was responsible for the greater part of the increase. Collections from the corporations during 1926 amounted to $1,256,793,285, or an increase of $300,525,067 over 1925, when the corporation tax produced $956,268,218.

The individual income tax returned $915,335,035 to the government in 1926 as compared with $869,435,917 in 1925.

SPORTS RULE HITS CENTRAL NORMAL

The new Michigan Collegiate Conference, recently organized by the three normal colleges of the Lower Peninsula and the Detroit City College, is hailed with approval by the majority of Central Normal students and teachers, though they realize that the freshmen rule adopted by the conference will work greater hardship on Central Normal than on any of the other three schools.

The Mt. Pleasant school has the smallest enrollment of the four schools, and among its 900 students there are two co-eds for every man. In other words, Central has about 300 men from which to draw all its athletic material. Since the normal is primarily a two-year school, although a greater number are beginning to take three and four-year courses, the elimination of freshmen means that many of the men will be available for the varsity only during one year, that is, their second year on two-year courses. However, Central offers a four-year course in physical education, and some of the other life teaching certicate courses have been extended to three years. This means that each year a greater number of students will be in school more than two years.

It is fortunate for Central Normal, too, that the freshmen rule will not take effect until the fall of 1927, although competition in the conference will start in basketball this winter. Central is depending upon its freshmen material to provide several recruits for basketball, baseball and track the coming season. When the freshmen rule takes effect, these men will be eligible as sophomores.

RADIO TO DIRECT CAR FERRIES OF PERE MARQUETTE

Work has been begun on the installation of radio compasses on the seven Pere Marquette car ferries operating out of Ludington to Milwaukee and Manitowoc. Carferry No. 22 is the first vessel to be so equipped. The device is equipped with a loop antenna, similar to an ordinary radio receiving set, which automatically indicates the direction of the incoming compass signals.

Government radio compass stations will be located at Milwaukee and at Point Betsie near Frankfort, while the Ludington radio station will act in this capacity for the present. The new radio facilities are expected to speed the boats greatly in bad weather and add materially to their safety.

NEW PINEAPPLE RECIPES

"New Dishes—Tested"

THIS interesting placard is pasted on a card catalogue in a certain kitchen in an old Connecticut house which has been made over into a modern kitchen without losing any of the charm of burnished copper kettles and shining pewter pots arrayed along the top of an old-fashioned, open fireplace.

This modern system of card cataloguing new recipes which have been tried and have made good is the device of a woman who studied efficiency in business methods before she learned efficiency in homemaking. She explains her system thus:

"Every week I test one new recipe, and if it proves to be a delicious dish, it is filed for future reference. In this way we have fifty-two new dishes every year. As the old dishes are replaced by something better, their cards are discarded."

A peep into last year's catalogue of fifty-two recipes revealed some very attractive ones, and among them a list of pineapple dishes some of which were copied. Whether they go into a card catalogue, or the old-fashioned bulging, recipe book, they will no doubt find a welcome with the housewife.

French Toast with Pineapple was among the foremost breakfast dishes. Sift together one cup flour, one-half teaspoon salt, one teaspoon baking powder. Add one cup milk and two well beaten eggs; beat well. Dip round slices of white bread into batter and fry in hot fat. Lay on plate, dust with sugar and top with slice of Hawaiian pineapple—a medium can contains eight slices. In center of pineapple put one-half teaspoon red jelly—currant is delicious.

Deviled Pineapple among the luncheon dishes was marked as especially good. Cut six hard-boiled eggs lengthwise. Remove yolks and mix with contents of one buffet size can of crushed Hawaiian pineapple, one tablespoon vinegar and one-half teaspoon salt. Pile pineapple mixture in the eggs and serve on lettuce leaves with mayonnaise dressing. Garnish with two tablespoons chopped salted peanuts.

Savarin of Pineapple was classified under "inexpensive desserts". Use a round tube pan for baking plain sponge cake mixture. Add one-half cup sugar to one medium can sliced Hawaiian pineapple. Boil for fifteen minutes; cool. Arrange cake on serving platter. Pierce with fork and gently pour syrup into cake until it is all absorbed. Arrange pineapple slices around cake, overlapping the slices. Pile whipped cream, slightly sweetened on top and serve.

Defends Prohibition

FROM THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE TO CONGRESS, DEC. 7, 1926

"The duly authorized public authorities of the this country have made prohibition the law of the land. Acting under the constitution the congress and the legislatures of practically all the states have adopted legislation for its enforcement. Some abuses have arisen which require reform. Under the law the national government has entrusted to the treasury department the especial duty of regulation and enforcement. Such supplementary legislation as it requires to meet existing conditions should be carefully and speedily enacted.

Failure to support the constitution and observe the law ought not to be tolerated by public opinion. Especially those in publc places, who have taken their oath to support the constitution, ought to be most scrupulous in its observance. Officers of the department of justice throughout the country should be vigilant in enforcing the law, but local authorities, which had always been mainly responsible for the enforcement of law in relation to intoxicating liquor ought not to seek evasion by attempting to shift the burden wholly upon the federal agencies.

Under the constitution the states are jointly charged with the nation in providing for the enforcement of the prohibition amendment. Some people do not like the amendment some do not like other parts of the constitution, some do not like any o fit. Those who entertain such sentiments have a perfect right to seek through legal methods for a change.

But for any of our inhabitants to observe such parts of the constitution as they like, while disregarding others, is a doctrine that would break down all protection of life and property and destroy the American system of ordered liberty."

In the annual budget the President asks for $30,000,000 to enforce the law, backing his recommendations with these words:

"Whatever is necessary to put into effect the expressed will of the people as written into the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and the will of Congress as expressed in the Volstead act, will be done.

"Whatever funds may be necessary to vindicate the law and secure compliance with its provisions should be provided.

"The constitutional duties of the President and the Congress makeany other course indefensible.'

State Editors Plan Better Home Papers

An even stronger "home town" press, to serve the needs of Michigan's local communities in increasing measure, stood out as the goal of some 175 members of the Michigan Press Association, gathered in annual conference here February 3, 4 and 5.

The attendance was not only the largest in the history of the association, but was said by old-time newspaper men to be the greatest gathering of active newspaper publishers ever held in Michigan. From the far corners of the Upper Peninsula to the Indiana border, editors of the state's leading weekly papers were gathered for the conference.

While much of the conference program concerned itself with technical questions related to the building of better newspaper, features of entertainment and inspiration were not lacking. Herman Roe, of Northfield, Minnesota, president of the National Editorial Association, and others of national prestige joined the strictly "local talent" in leading disscussion at the meetings.

Organizations of the Half Century Club of Michigan Press Association members stood out as the most interesting event of the meetings. During the annual banquet, held on Thursday evening, Feb. 3, men who had served their communities for a half century were called upon to tell of their lifetime experiences in the newspaper game. Later these men, together with others who could not attend the conference, were made honorary life members of the Michigan Press Association and initiated as charter members of the Half Century Club.

Officers elected to lead the press association for the coming year are: H. T. Johnson, Saranic Advertiser, president; W. H. Berkey, Cassopolis Vigilant, vice president; and Herbert Wood, Bangor Advance, sect.-treasurer.

Farmers Week Crowd Breaks All Records

Breaking all attendance records for annual Farmers Week at M. S. C., between 7,000 and 8,000 farmers and their families gathered on the East Lansing campus last week to attend the various meetings and conferences.

Fine weather and open roads made it possible for visitors to come by automobile from almost any section of the state, a factor which is said to have played a big part in the unusually heavy attendance.

New champions appeared at several of the shows held during the week. Large numbers of exhibits in the grain, potato, apple, eggs, and floral shows draw a continuous stream of visitors.

Two members of Congress sounded a note of optimism in their talks on the attitude of Congress toward relief legislation for farmers. Other national authorities who spoke at the general sessions stressed the trend of the movement toward general recognition of the importance of a prosperous agriculture to insure the continued prosperity of the country.

Thirty seven state wide organizations held their annual meetings at M. S. C. during the week. In the gatherings of these various organizations, satisfaction was generally expressed with the accomplishments of the past year, along with a renewed determination to continue efforts in aid of agricultural progress.

Farm Bureau Legislative News

The McNary—Haugen bill is now before the Senate and is scheduled for debate by the House next week. The proponents claim a majority of eight in the senate. The real fight from the present outlook will be in the House, if you have not written congressman Joseph L. Hooper yet to support this bill do so at once. The proponents of this measure which in somewhat different form that met defeat in Congress last year claim that if the measure voted down a year ago had been in operation in 1925 producers of five farm products would have received $1,342,000,000 more than they were actually paid.

The law makers passed laws favoring the Railroads allowing them to raise their rates etc. to take care of the demands by labor organizations which Congress gave an eight hour day, also passed an immigration bill to prevent foreigners competing with American labor—otherwise a tariff on labor. Why shouldn't Congress pass laws helping the farmers? Aren't we as good as the other fellow? Congressman Brand of the 7th district Ohio has the farmers portion of heart and gave a wonderful address at the State farm bureau banquets at East Lansing February 3rd. I wonder where Congressman Hooper stands? Ask him.

The State Legislature after a recess of nearly two weeks resumed work in earnest Feb. 2 an accumulation of nearly forty bills was immediately thrown into the legislative hopper. Among them are several varieties of Capital punishment. The State farm bureau went on record favoring Capital punishment with the exception of circumstantial evidence and self defense.

Several measures dealing with the highway finance are proposed, one which seems to be gaining popularity among the law makers is one sponsored by C. J. Town of Onondaga proposing to raise the gax tax to 4c a gallon while a companion measure sponsored by Rep. William P. Strauch of Vermont proposes a $5 permanent license for passenger cars and the present schedule of Annual weight license levies for commercial vehicles, including trucks and buses.

Another new tax measure which is certain to excite a great deal of discussion was introduced by Sen. Peter B. Lennon of Genesee Co. It provides a tax of $2 per thousand on cigaretts and a flat 10 percent tax on all other forms of tobacco, wholesalers and retailers would be licensed and the tax would be collected through stamps which would be purchased by the dealers and affixed to the packages.

Acting under suspension of the rules, the House and Senate passed unanimously a resolution calling attention to the importance of the Great Lakes—St. Lawrence Waterway and urging upon President Coolidge and Congress the necessity of entering inte proper treaties with Canada and proceeding at once with this project. This acrion of the Legislature followed closely upon receipt by the law makers of a special message on this subject for Governor Green.

H. E. Powell of Ionia is the new Commissioner of Agriculture appointed by Gov. Green to succeed L. Whitney Watkins. Mr. Powell is experienced in public life and with farm organizations. O. C. Holcomb, Minute Man of Adams Township.

Extempore Speaking Association

North Adams high school has been invited to join the extempore speaking association of Michigan high schools, an organization being formed by educators of the state to develop a new field of scholastic training and competition.

County contests will be held April 8, and district contests April 28, both leading to the state contest at Kalamazoo May 6. These contests, as the name of the association implies, will be contests in extemporaneous speaking. The aim of the association, as given by Prof. C. P. Lahman of the Western Normal, state manager, in information to local school officials, is "to train boys and girls in the study of current affairs, assimilation of ideas, and genuine extemporaneous public speaking which combines pleasing delivery and ability to think on one's feet."

Topics will be chosen from outstanding current events discussed in the January, February and March issues of the Literary Digest and the Review of Reviews. One hour before the contests each contestant will draw three topics by lot, and when he takes the platform he will give a five minutes speech on any one of the three.

Started in France

In 1868, a wealthy Frenchman bequeathed his estate to the Convent of the Dominican Nuns at Quellins, near Lyons, for the purpose of erecting a chapel in which the perpetual adoration of the Most Holy Eucharist would be observed. Pope Pius IX, then living, granted this privilege to the Convent of Quellins and it was from this beginning in France that the present-day monastery in Detroit, and six similiar institutions in this country, sprang.

Every minute of the day and night in all of the monasteries of this branch of the Dominican Nuns, some members of the community, usually two, are assigned to keep the ceaseless vigil in front of the exposed Host in the monastery chapel. Here the silent nuns pray, for the sins of the city and of the world and for the intentions of their benefactors, until their time is up and they are relieved by other nuns who take up the watch.

When not engaged in the perpetual adoration, the nuns do fine needlework in their common workroom, making vestments, silken banners and similiar objects. They sing the Divine Office in their chapel, observing the canonical hours in the traditional manner which has been handed down in the Catholic church for centuries. At recreation time they stroll in the convent garden, if the weather is fair, and busy themselves in the cultivation of the flowers and plants which grow there.

Uncle John and Aunt Minnie Debate Many Farm Problems Over Radio

There is all the difference in the world between learning things by talking them over, and just being told, believes "Uncle John" Stahl, who with "Aunt Minnie" Stearns, talks things over via WLS, radio voice of the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation with hundreds of midwest farmers every day.

"Uncle John" is, in real life, John M. Stahl, known to farmers as the Father of Rural Free Delivery, and champion of the first parcels post law; and to the literary world as writer, lecturer and editor. Mr. Stahl is Farm Advisor of the Agricultural Foundation, which is serving the rural business man through research, bulletins, radio schools and individual counsel. "Aunt Minnie", his team mate in those individual radio broadcasts, is Mrs. Minnie Stearns, of Philo, Illinois, one of the foremost farm women of her state, and until recently, herself the owner and operator of an 80 acre farm.

As the clock reaches 11:50 each day, Uncle John pulls up his old splint bottomed chair before the microphone in the tower studio of WLS, Chicago. Aunt Minnie, figuratively, wipes her hands on her apron and sitting down beside him they talk things over as only seasoned, experienced farm folk, grown up close to mother earth, could talk them over.

Uncle John has just turned sixty six Aunt Minnie has raised six stalwart sons and daughters, sent them all to the state university at Urbana, and seen them settle down and start raising their families. So when farmers write in wanting to know how to clean up a pig shelter, how to make whitewash that will stick, whether you have to feed pigs tankage if you can give them plenty of skim milk, how to get rid of Canada thistle, and what is the best corn to grow in central Illinois, Aunt Minnie and Uncle John know. But they don't always get together on what they know.

Uncle John says, in his opinion, it is better economy for a farm family to sell its cattle and hogs on the hoof to the city market and buy its meats fresh.

"No sir," says Aunt Minnie. "My daughter-in-law put up a whole quarter of beef last year and at the present price of beef loin you just figure out how much it would cost her to buy that much meat for her family." And between them they decide that it is good economy to butcher at least one animal each winter and cut up the meat.

Sometimes these little arguments grow heated, and the next mail brings letters from listeners-in who say, "I'm on Aunt Minnie's side and I know she is right because— Or "You are right, Uncle John. Down in our neighborhood we have found—"

"Weeds seem to be the worst problem of the farmer, or at least the one on which he wants help most," says Uncle John. Fully half the letters that come into the Question Box ask how to get rid of Johnson grass, Canada thistle or some other plant pest. The next problem is feeding the farm animals. They want to know all about commercial feeds, whether it is better economy to grow all the feed on the farm or buy it, and what are the best rations for animals at different ages.

"When I find that a number of people are interested in the same thing, Aunt Minnie and I hunt around, in our own experience, in the Foundation's big agricultural library, or go to an acknowledged expert in that particular matter, and find the best and most practical solution. Then we just sit down and talk it over as any two good farmers would talk it over if they met on the road or at the post office. But every letter that reaches our desk gets also an individual personal answer."

Care of the Hatching Eggs

Eggs are now being saved for hatching; in fact, many incubators are already in operation, and at this time, it is well to consider the care that should be given the eggs to be hatched. Much depends upon the care that has been given the breeding stock as the fall and winter care have much to do with the hatchability and life of the egg and vitality of the chicks hatched.

Past care of the breeding flock cannot now be changed. It should be remembered, however, that in order to produce an egg that will hatch into a strong, livable chick, the breeding stock must be fed well, and fed feeds that will not only produce eggs but that will produce eggs carrying the vitamines necessary for normal chick development. Exposure of the flock to direct sunlight not filtered through glass, exposure to ultra-violet light or the liberal feeding of cod liver oil will enable the birds to lay eggs high in D vitamine content that should hatch strong livable chicks.

In order that the eggs may be fertile, a sufficient number of male birds should be maintained in the flocks. In the Leghorns and lighter breeds, there should be five or six males to one hundred females, and in the heavier breeds, such as the Rocks and Wyandottes, there should be seven or eight males to each one hundred females. An excess number of male birds is undesirable as too many males only worry one another and are not necessary in the flock. Some eggs will be fertile the second day after the males are added to the pen, and usually by the fourth or fifth day after the introduction of the males the eggs will be quite fertile and a safe rule to follow is to start saving eggs for hatching on the fifth day, after the introduction of the males.

During cold weather, the eggs should be gathered sufficiently so that they will not be chilled, and when the temperature inside the laying house is below freezing, they should be gathered three or four times each day. The eggs should then be carefully sorted and all eggs weighing less than one and seven eighths ounces should be discarded as well as eggs that are of poor color, off in shape, or of poor shell texture. The eggs saved should be packed in cases, twenty-four dozens to the case with an excelsior pad between each layer of eggs. The eggs should be kept in a room where the temperature is kept at approximately fifty five degrees or where the temperature ranges anywhere from forty to sixty-five degrees but never at a temperature in excess of sixty-five degrees, as at a temperature of seventy-two degrees, incubation starts, cell division commences and the egg very soon becomes worthless as a hatching egg. The embryo develops to a point where it dies before being placed in the incubator, or soon thereafter The eggs should be turned daily before incubation and when packed in cases, this can be easily accomplished by turning the case first on one side and then on another, and by changing the position of the case, the eggs are effectively turned daily.

The Railroad Crossing Accident Question

All over this state and especially in this section there are occurring a lot of railroad accidents at crossings by careless autoists coming on down the line slam bang regardless of how near the train is. Somebody has suggested that some of this trouble could be stopped by a law requiring all autoists to stop look and listen before crossing the track. We claim it would not make much difference to the average driver who is bound to get across anyhow before the train. Thousands of careless drivers who are always in a hurry might stop and listen, and hear the train coming—then start again and try to cross and possibly nine times out of ten they might make the crossing safely. In this way they would be inside the law yet do the same damage which they did before. Then again, somebody suggests tightening up the conditions of licenses by making it impossible for a person who is slightly blind, deaf or of immature judgment to obtain the license. This might be somewhat of a handicap to a good many raw motorists but it would never eliminate the hair-brained crazy joy rider who puts forth every effort to beat the train to the crossing. Most of these reckless drivers are men if put to the test, could pass a very satisfactory physical and mental test. The matter of placing underneath crossings to a large majority of the dangerous places along the lines is a monstrous one, and involves an expenditure of millions of dollars by the railroads. The Manufacturer published at Detroit, claims to be an authority on these matters and says that it is possible to prevent most of the accidents by making it impossible for such drivers to get a license.

Pupils may get suggestions and material from their local physicians, their local tuberculosis society, the State Library at Lansing and the Michigan Tuberculosis Association. The best essay in the school is to be selected by any method deemed wise by the local school authorities. The essays are then to be forwarded to the Michigan Tuberculosis Association before April 15. WHEN RADIO TURNS NAVIGATOR

Radio Direction Finder Guides and Locates Vessels at Sea in Fair and Foul Weather.

"Unable to give position—last bearings taken three days ago — we're lost!"

Thus reads the terse but dramatic message from a ship in distress. Out in the blackness of the night, pitching and tossing on waves stirred to a frenzy by the wintry gale, are fellow mariners and passengers, far off the traveled ocean lanes and all but lost save for the slender thread of radio communication.

"Keep sending us test signals," flashes back our operator. "Will locate by direction finder." And so the latest wonder of marine radio and the newest aid to modern navigation is brought into play.

Soon our operator is at the radio direction finder in the pilot house. A moment later he is wearing the headphones and manipulating the receiver dials. He begins turning the handwheel, which serves to swing the small loop frame on the deck above into the very teeth of the angry gale. The operator listens intently; the captain and other silently stand nearby; the swings of the hand-wheel become shorter and shorter. Here it is—the line of signals—the direction of their passage through space from the radiating point! But on which side of our ship —in what sense? Now the operator throws a switch, swings the handwheel again. The swings become shorter until they virtually stop. The operator now bends down as he peers through a magnifying glass, squinting an eye so as to line up the parallax lines which will give an accurate reading from the compass card below. Then he gives the reading to the pilot of the ship. A few moments later the course is changed, and the ship throbs to the command of full speed ahead in the face of a heavy sea.

How Compass Works

One hour, two hours, three hours— and our ship comes within searchlight range of the vessel in distress. A rescue is out of the question in such a rough sea, but we stand-by, ready to act if absolutely necessary.

Just as the dog turns his ears in determining the direction of sounds, so does the radio direction finder turn its loop to get a bearing on a given transmitter. This ingenious radio device operates on the principle that a given signal of maximum intensity will be received with a loop so placed that its plane is pointing at the radio station which is transmitting. If, on the other hand, the plane of the loop lies at right angles to the direction of the radio transmitter, no energy is picked up and nothing can be heard in the earphones. The position at which the signal drops out, or so-called minimum, is well defined and is employed in reading the direction of the transmitting station from the compass card.

The standard marine direction finder, as now installed on many ships, is entirely self-contained and occupies less than two square feet of floor space, in the pilot house or chart room. On the deck, above the pilot house or chart room, is the sturdy tripod frame supporting the loop which is encased in bakelite tubing with aluminum alloy fittings. The protective tubing of the loop measures 4½ inches in diameter, while the loop measures 30 inches on a side. A 2 to 1 reduction gear, operating by the vertical hand-wheel, serves to swing the loop in all directions, even in high gales, without backlash or interference.

Service Now Universal

So important is the direction finder in navigation that radio beacons, like lighthouses and lightships, have come into existence along our coasts as infallible guides to coastwise and transoceanic and lake navigators. These radio beacons, operated by the U. S. Lighthouse Service, now extend up and down the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, along the Gulf of Mexico, and on the Great Lakes, as well as in Alaska and Hawaii.

Operated on regular schedule, the radio beacons are also pressed into service when weather conditions warrant steady operation. Operating on 1,000 meters wavelength assigned for such radio transmission by international regulation, the ICW or interrupted-continuous-wave transmitters employed send out signals that vary in note and in character, so that each beacon may be readily identified. Heretofore, all radio beacons have been operated at the same time, causing considerable and troublesome interference because of the unified wavelength. This interference has been eliminated, however, through the use of synchronized clock switches, which now cause each radio beacon to transmit alone for a given time, so that just one beacon will be sending out direction-finding signals in a given locality.

"Invariably, navigators are enthusiastic in their praise of the direction finder, which, in many cases, has taken precedence over the time-honored sextant in determining a ship's position, even when ideal weather prevailed," according to T. M. Stevens of the Radio Corporation of America. "In foggy and cloudy weather, of course, the radio direction finder serves to solve what has hitherto been a serious predicament. Where soundings are impractical along steep coasts, because of great depths a short distance off shore, navigators have used the radio direction finder and their known speed in guiding their ships along.

DETROIT COUPLE ESCAPED CHINESE

R. H. Steininger, who with his wife escaped to Hong Kong while the Cantonese troops were looting the city of Foochow, is the son of the Rev. and Mrs. James S. Steininger, 1432 Putnam avenue, Detroit, pastor of the Martha Holmes Memorial Methodist Episcopal church. Steininger, who is 31 years old, has been in China five years, employed as a construction engineer at Yenting by the Methodist Foreign Missions Board. Mrs. Steininger, 28, formerly of Troy, Ohio, is a missionary.

Steinnger's parents were greatly relieved when informed that dispatches from Hong Kong listed their son and his wife as among those who escaped to Hong Kong. They had not heard from him since early in December, when they received a letter from Foochow which described the couple's flight from Yenting, which was made when the fighting became fierce in that section, 150 miles inland from Foochow, in early November.

"My son explained that the Cantonese troops already had occupied Foochow, but reported that the city was orderly and he did not forsee any further bloodshed in that section," the Rev. Mr. Steininger said.

"We naturally have been following closely developments in China and we were shocked when we read that Foochow was being looted and pillaged by the Red army. Ever since the first dispatches reporting disorders in Foochow we have feared for our son and his wife. We certainly are glad to learn that they are in Hong Kong, and now feel that they are permanently safe."

The younger Steininger went to China in 1921, where he met his wife, who was a Methodist missionary. They were married in the Orient and returned here early last summer for a visit with the Rev. and Mrs. Steininger.

PEACH CROP IS FEARED KILLED FOR THIS SEASON

Part of Michigan's 1927 peach crop is believed to have been killed in Southwestern Michigan, when the mercury in the themometers dropped 31 degrees in 12 hours.

Fruit growers recall how a similar drop in temperature in 1924 killed almost the entire peach crop in Berrien County. The sudden change in temperature took place before the buds had their winter covers securely tucked about them. The theory is that the bark and shucks protecting the buds had not sufficiently hardened prior to the freeze. There is doubt whether the buds were prepared this winter for near zero weather ushered in on short notice.

FEW AUTO VICTIMS IN GRAND RAPIDS

Grand Rapids, Mich., was the second city in the United States in the lownes of its death rate from automobile accidents during 1926, it was revealed in statistics prepared by the Commerce Department.

Only one other municipality, Kansas City, Kans., excelled the Michigan city in keeping down the automobile death roll. Grand Rapids had only 12 fatal motor accidents in 1926, listed as having occurred within the city limits. This gave the city a death rate of only 7.7 per 100,000 of population. Kansas City, Kans., on the other hand, kept its death rate down to the unbelievable minimum of nine-tenths of one death per 100,000 of population.

Detroit is well up on the list of cities having a high auto accident mortality, only four cities in the country havng a higher death rate from this source in 1926. Detroit is listed as having had 355 fatalities and is assigned a death rate of 17.6 per 100,000.

Only the total figures are given for Detroit, no distinction having been made between accidents occuring inside and outside city limits, but using similar figures for other cities as the basis of comparison, only four, Albany, Camden, Canton and Cincinnati, had a worse record. The death rates given for these cities are: Albany, 33.7; Camden, 40.6; Canton, 29.2; Cincinnati, 30.3.

MISSIONARY FROM INDIA TO VISIT HOME IN ALBION

According to word received by Albion relatives, Rev. Rockwell Clancy and family of Bombay, India, where the former has been a Methodist missionary for many years, have sailed for the United States on furlough. They will travel slowly, expecting to reach the United States in June or July. During their year's furlough, a son and two daughters of Rev. and Mrs. Clancy, will enter Albion college.

HEAVY CALF SHIPMENTS HIT FUTURE DAIRY HERDS

Heavy shipments of calves from Michigan points to Detroit and Buffalo forecast a shortage of good dairy cattle in the near future, in the opinion of prominent livestock breeders.

Daily receipts of calves on the Detroit livestock market range from 100 to 850 while as many more are shipped daily by motor trucks or express as dressed veal.

Receipts at the East Buffalo stock yards vary from 150 to 1900 a day, and most of these calves are shipped from Michigan. Dairy calves form the major part of the shipments. Reports from the dairy belt indicate that farmers are retaining only enough heifers for replacements in their herds.

WINTER TAKES BIG TOLL OF BIRD LIFE

Winter brings great hardships on birds. It imprisons them under a crust of hard snow, which smothers them with its weight, or it causes starvation by sealing their store of food in a coating of ice. Cold, too, takes its toll. The birds that bed in tall trees or in the leafless bushes at the of zero weather. Even pines and cedars offer but scanty shelter from the edge of the meadows are at the mercy winter gales and not infrequently their occupants are dead in the morning.

Sometimes the crow, hardiest of our winter residents and often the only stir of life on a hard and cheerless landscape, falls victim to the cold. Crows seem to express the character of the weather by the manner of their flight. In the spring and fall they call lustily as they wing to their roosts from the surrounding fields and perform graceful evolutions in the air. But in the winter their flight is heavy and dispirited. They settle silently into the treetops, fearful of the night.

Crows die in an unusual manner in winter, says Dallas Lore Sharp. Their eyes freeze in very severe weather. Sharp writes as follows of the queer death that is visited on crows while they sleep in icy roosts:

"But the crows sleep on, however high the winds. They sit close to the branches, that the feathers may cover their clinging feet. they tuck their heads beneath their wing coverts, thus protecting the whole body, except one side of the head, which the feathers of the eye can not quite shelter. This leaves an eye exposed, and this eye, like the heel of Achilles, proves to be the one vulnerable spot. It freezes in very severe weather, causing a slow, painful death.

"In the morning, after an unusually cold night, you can find dozens of crows flapping piteously about the trees of the roost and upon the ground with frozen eyes."

Sharp tells of visiting a roost after a sub-zero night:

"I saw many of them along the Hollow, blind in one eye or both eyes, dying of pain and starvation. It was pitiful to see their sufferings. The snow in places was sprinkled with their broken feathers, and with pine needles which they had plucked off and tried to eat. Nothing could be done for the poor things. I have tried time and again to doctor them, but they were sure to die in the end."

UPPER PEN. SPORTSMEN GET WOODLAND CAMPS

Upper peninsula sportsmen's organizations are taking more seriously to the matter of providing woodland camps for the members of their various organizations.

The latest to secure a parcel of land for the forest headquarters of the membership is the Menominee Sportsmen's association which recently purchased a tract of ten acres of heavily timbered land on route 12 about 14 miles north of Menominee and lying between the state highway and the Menominee river.

A number of the members will visit the site during the winter and cut away enough of the oak timber to build a log clubhouse in the spring.

The Menominee club consists of 200 members.

RECALLS FIGHT FOR STATEHOOD

Ninety years ago, January 26, 1837, Michigan became the 26th state of the Union.

The birth of the sovereign state of Michigan came only after years of the hardest kind of political struggle, one that matched in intensity the economic struggle of the pioneers who came from the East in their Conestaga wagons to clear the wilderness and make their homes.

Michigan has histories that give step by step, a vivid picture of this long-drawn out fight against a careless and loose government at Washington, dishonest office holders and red tape that seems almost unbelievable in its ramifications. It constitutes an heroic epic, this story of early political tribulations, one that deserves to be sung as well as written.

Michigan arose to the status of statehood after many changes of government and territorial area. At first it was an undefined portion of the Northwest Territory, inhabited only by roving Red men, fur traders who pushed with unbelievable audacity into every danger, with here and there an outpost, or a fort, each of which later became the nucleus of a town or village. The seat of government was then at Chillicothe, Ohio, from which men looked to the West and marveled at the tales of forests and rivers and game told by the returning adventurers.

Michigan became a part of Indiana Territory and then was set apart as Michigan territory and the government was established at Detroit on January 11, 1805. Detroit was then crude and raw, a frontier town typical of early America, but it contained a great many men of learning and culture.

From almost the beginning of American occupation the bulk of the residents were from New England and New York, steeped in the political traditions of the Revolution, and in all that region of their origin they had been schooled to a scheme of direct, popular government of which the old fashioned town meeting was the basis.

The pioneers, men and women of indomitable courage and will, were fully occupied with cold, hunger and the attendant hardships of those who maintain frontiers of civilization, yet they gave themselves freely to the cause of Michigan. Michigan was an ideal—not a stretch of territory. It was their home and was to be the home of their children and grand children. When the long fight was won, the victory was hailed with universal joy, pride, gratitude, thanksgiving.

When Michigan was made a territory, Washington, singularly blind to the wants of the young West, proceeded to select a "government." Instead of picking the best qualified men of the territory or asking the people of Detroit to elect certain men for the approval of the president and congress, the government selected Gen. William Hull of Massachusetts, who had won many honors in the Revolution, as the governor; Judge Augustus B. Woodward, a native of New York and a resident of Virginia; John Griffin, Vincennes judge, and Frederick Bates, also of Virginia, as sharers in the legislative, executive and judicial authority.

These men, all but Mr. Bates, who had been postmaster in Detroit for the two preceding years, were responsible to Washington and not at all to the people over whom they were given supreme authority.

It is not strange that the citizens of Detroit were loud spoken in their criticisms.

DETROIT, HOME OF PLANE INDUSTRY, LACKS AIR POST

The leasing of Packard field leaves Detroit with no landing field for the use of privately owned airplanes.

The absence of a landing field puts the city in the position of being the only large municipality in the country which does not maintain and operate a landing field for airplanes. The only fields available about Detroit are certain inadequate spaces mostly many miles from the city limits and lying in undeveloped subdivisions. The Ford airport, maintained by Henry Ford, for the use of his own airplanes, is not open to the general public.

Detroit's landing field committee is daily considering propositions offered by owners of land and others interested in the establishment of a field. For the present, the field in the Zachariah Chandler park is available to the visiting flyer, but experts in the city declare that inadequate. Packard field will be subdivided in the spring and Detroit faces a summer in which aviation enterprises, already well launched, will face the important obstacle of no field for test flying or visiting flyers.

HOLLAND GIVES UP MILK RECORD TO BUY MORE GASOLINE

Henry Bosch, milk inspector, believes that Holland lost its title as champion milk consuming city in the United States in 1926 because of an increase in the automobile census.

"Nearly everyone has an automobile today and some cannot buy milk and gasoline too. So the milk is forgotten," says Mr. Bosch, who also believes that the increased yield of fruit in 1926 cut down the consumption of milk.

Figures show that Holland's milk consumption dropped 721,000 quarts in 1926 compared with 1925, when this city held the title. In 1925 Holland consumed 2,700,500 quarts of milk. In 1926 consumption dropped to 1,979,595 quarts of milk and 64,970 quarts of cream.

JAIL COMFORTS IN KENT BANNED

"Old timers" at the Kent county jail this winter are receiving a new deal, but it doesn't meet their desires by a long way. Sheriff Byron J. Patterson, former state prohibition enforcement officer and the county's first "dry" sheriff since Michigan's liquor law was adopted, has banned newspapers from the county jail, has ordered that any evidence of gambling by the prisoners will result in taking playing cards from them, has cut down visitors' nights to once a week and has eliminated the usual week day religious services.

One of the first orders to go into effect was that no newspapers should be allowed among the prisoners. Jail sentences are not to be rest cures with all the comforts of a first class hostelry, the sheriff announced after he had discovered that two prisoners had a folding table upon which, after it was set up between the bunks, were placed viands approaching a feast. When the table was cleared a game of cards was begun and then same magazines and newspapers.

Roberta Risks It

CHAPTER FORTY-THREE

On the way home, merely to quiet his nerves and dispel a lurking and groundless suspicion, Scott stopped at the club to look over the newspaper files for two or three days back. Studying the reports of the Scott episode, he found little easement in the fact that Celia had vanished during the confusion caused by a bon fire ignited behind the barn—a device that might easily have originated in the prolific mind of his heir.

The dogs, having first been lured through a cut in the barbed wire, afterward mysteriously patched—Son might have done that, too—had been found barking at Nixon, who had sought safety in a tree. Nixon accounted for his presence there by saying that he had been out for a walk, had heard a whistle sounding like a signal from the hill, and in going to investigate it had been attacked by the dogs.

Scott, for reasons unknown, had suspected Mrs. Horatio Smith, a widow residing in the vicinity, of complicity in his daughter's abduction, and with the Fitzwilliam sheriff had personally searched her house during her temporary absence, without result. Mrs. Smith, who claimed to have come recently from Seattle, had arrived in Fitzwilliam Tuesday morning of the preceding week (Tuesday—Hm!—the boy had left New York Monday), and had immediately taken a furnished house belonging to Francis J. Finlaw of Boston. She had traveled from New York in her own car, a five-passenger touring model of such and such a make (like the boy's car), with a chauffeur who gave his name as Peter Brown (P. B.—H'mph!—curious coincidence), a tall young man of about twenty-five, with black hair (black hair? Oh, well!) and gray eyes. Later, on the same day, Mrs. Smith's housekeeper had arrived, an elderly Scotch woman, who said she had worked in Mr. Smith's family for thirty years. An old Scotch woman who had worked for the family for thirty years? Brazenoze did some intensive thinking.

After a hasty dinner he drove to Brooklyn, ostensibly to inquire, as he did at long intervals, into the welfare of his old servant, who was not at home. Her sister said that Janet had departed suddenly, with a pormanteau on Tuesday week, in response to a telegram received late Monday night. She had refused to tell where she was going, or from whom the telegram had come, and nothing had been heard of her since.

Melvin had seen the boy sending a telegram from Hartford Monday night—with a widow waiting outside in a familiar car.

Therefore, while Roberta smiled on her plloiw, whispering: "Percival Galahad! Oh, la, la!" and Nixon tossed on his, as he sought a solution of his many troubles, Grover Brazenose, who was a man of action, conculted railway schedules. He alone of the three, occupying an upper berth on the midnight train to Boston, did not sleep at all that night.

And the next morning was the time chosen by Roberta—or, if you like, by Fate—for the explosion of her little private bomb.

Piggy, returning to the house with a brow slightly furrowed, found her downstairs and alone, and to her he related his conversation with Nixon and the detective. She took it smiling, but for the first time he showed uneasiness.

"I don't much like it," he confessed. "I thought they'd let us alone now. But if that fellow Nixon—"

"I told you Clif was persistent," she mentioned, with an impish gleam, when he did not finish his sentence, "But he's a selfish worldling, seeking his own, and you can foil him again. He hasn't your pure purpose—Galahad." He looked at her, flushing darkly, and she added, "well, Percival Galahad, if you prefer it in full."

Piggy froze into immobility, his erstwhile volcanic color fading to an icy pallor. In the brief moment of silence his opinion of girls, recently uplifted, fell with a thud which, if not dull, was superlatively sickening.

"Who told you that?" he demanded thickly. "Was it Janet?"

His expression boded ill for her informant, and Roberta, never suspecting, in spite of what Janet had told her, that she turned the knife in an old and festering wound, conceived this to be a situation better carried off with a light hand. Therefore she answered, her manner the more airy becaues she was a little frightened and trying to hide it:

"Oh, I'm just intuitive. Probably you don't know enough about girls to understand, but we all are. It's a feminine trait." Then, when Piggy stood motionless, staring at her in a still, white rage, she rattled on, desperately struggling to bring him into key and making the discord greater with every syllable. "The name suits you, you see. Percival fell once, I believe, but Galahad, never! He was a white knight, sans peur et sans reproche—like Bayard." Oh, couldn't he see how absured it was? Where was his sense of humor?

Piggy did not find it humorous. All his life he had guarded one bitter secret—the bitterer because it was ridiculous; in all his being there was but our morbid spot, feeding and waxing on its own supression, and Bob—Bob!—had smitten him there.

"Why, even Celia calls you a paladin!" she exclaimed, desperately.

Then the storm broke.

"She does, does she:' his voice was low, but it could not be described as quiet. Roberta received an impression of leashed lightning, no less deadly in its effects because it was unaccompanied by noise. "I suppose you've been talking it over and giggling. Just like girls. I thought you were different, but you're not. I might have known you'd never rest until you'd dug it out. Girls have no sense of honor. I never had anything to do with one before, and when I get out of this mess I never will again. I'm through!"

"But—Peter!" She moved toward him, now as pale as he, with outstretched hands, and he stepped back, shaken in the grip of his obession.

"Don't Peter me! My name is Percival Galahad Brazenose, and you know it. Everybody else will know it now.' He saw this tragic fact paraded for the amusement of a derisive world by these two girls.

"Why, Peter! Peter! We haven't talked it over. Celia doesn't know. I wouldn't tell her!" She caught his sleeve.

Deep under his sunny disposition lay the Brazenose temper, and when, rarely, it rose to the surface, it possessed him utterly. This was such an occasion and he jerked the sleeve away.

"Don't do that. You've spoiled it all now. I thought you were different, but——" He choked, but swept on, more furious than ever because he could feel anything but anger. "That's all over. I promised to get you out of here and I will, but—"

"You needn't!" she interrupted hotly. Roberta, too, was young, and the child of her father. Also, like Piggy, she had been under a long strain. "You needn't! If you feel that way about it, "I'll take Celia now and go——" She hesitated an instant, wondering where she could go, and finished triumphantly, "I'll go straight to Jaffrey—or Clif!"

"You'll do nothing of the sort," he retorted, forgetting that he now expected publicity at her hands. "You can go to 'Clif' whenever you like, after we once get away from here, but I'm not going to have my name mixed up in this thing. I've got a lot at stake—a lot that you don't know about."

"What have you at stake?"

"You may remember that my father and yours do business together. Even if I have been a fool, I don't intend to let dad pay for it. Even a girl ought to see that!"

CHAPTER FORTY-FOUR

Leaving Roberta breathless, Piggy flung out of the house and down the lane toward the village, followed by one of the detectives. Hurt and angry, he strode along into the road called by courtesy a street, too absorbed in his pain to notice the approach of the station cab—really a surrey—or the man who sprang from it at sight of him. But he was halted by a consciousness of some one directly in his path and looked up—into the wrathful face of his father.

"Well!" said Brazenose, in a curt undertone. "I thought I'd find you here."

Piggy's already blanched face turned paler.

"Dad!" he stammered, saluting with the caution that had become a habit of his masquerade. "Why—dad! What—how did you know?"

"Used my brains," snapped the author of his being. "All there are in the family, apparently. What the devil does this mean?"

"Look out," Piggy whispered, with a glance at the man behind, now drawing near. "That's a detective. Sit tight." Brazenose snorted, his flush deepening to purple, and his son continued in an audible and respectful tone: "She can't see nobody, sir. This thing has made her down sick. You're right, sir, it is a rotten shame. There's detectives an' newspaper guys thicker'n thieves all over everywhere. They even searched the house. Did you know that, sir?"

"Of course I knew it," was the sharp reply. "What do you think brought me here? I read the papers, young man."

"Yes, sir," said Piggy, as the detective strolled past, obviously taking comprehensive notes of Brazenose for his mental files. "It's been sump'n fierce. Looks like it was a crime to be a stranger. Mrs. Smith thought we might stay all winter, but believe me, she's had enough! Just as soon as she's able to get up and travel, we're going to leave."

"Damn your impudence!" growled his father, when the detective had passed out of hearing and paused, leaning against a fence, to look back at them. "What do you means by assuming that I'm interested in this woman?"

"Had to do it, dad. They're watching us like cats."

"Us? Who's 'us'? Who is this woman you're dangling after?"

"I'm not dangling after her." The color surged into Piggy's face again. "Not any!"

"Then who is she? What are you doing here—in that get-up?" An irate parental glance summed up dyed hair, penciled brows and lively in one contemptuous sweep. "What have you done with that girl?"

"What girl?"

"Don't try that. Not with me." The low tone held dangerous infections. "You know where Celia Scott is, and I'm going to before I've finished with you. I've come up here to get the truth and I'm going to have it."

"All right," said Piggy, after a moment, "I guess you're entitled to it. Let's walk, though, or we'll have the whole village watching us."

He turned back and into a forking road along a wooded slope where there were no houses, followed by the detective.

"Well?" Brazenose questioned sharply, when his son was silent. "If you have anything to say for yourself, out with it. First, who's this Mrs. Smith?"

"She's Scott's elder daughter, Roberta."

"She's Scott's older daughter? Well, you have distinguished yourself this time. R. K. Scott, of all men!"

"Yes, sir," Piggy answered meekly. "But I didn't know that—not at first. It happened this way."

Beginning with Nixon at the ferry, he told the story, which was punctuated by snorts, growls, and angry ejaculations from his father. When he repeated the narrative of the supposed Rowena Smith, concerning the imprisoned sister and the necessity of immediate rescue, Brazenose explosively cut in.

"Poppycock! Silly, romantic fools, the two of you! If Scott was really abusing this girl—which I don't for a minute believe; he's a tartar in business, but he's not a man to abuse his family. But even granting that he did, there are legal remedies the sister could have used to stop that. A writ of habeas corpus would have brought him to time a damn sight quicker and more effectively than this performance." Piggy gave him a blank stare and Brazenose senior scowled. "Didn't think of that, did you? Preferred to make a monkey of yourself—as usual. Go on."

Again, at the point of Roberta's confession that she had lied about her name and was G. A.'s daughter, he broke in.

"So you did know who she was before you left New York! Why didn't you stop then? You know what Scott means to us, and enough about his temper—"

"Yes, sir, but I'd promised. Besides—" The culprit paused, feeling that mention of a good sporting proposition might be inexpedient at the moment.

"Besides what? Think you're in love with this girl, I suppose."

"I do not," was the succient and fervent reply. "Quite the contrary. I hope to the Lord I never see or hear of her again, after we get out of this mess."

"H'm! Well?"

The tale was resumed, and when there was no allusion to the old serving woman, Brazenose once more interrupted:

"What about Janet? Don't leave her out."

Piggy, who had not seen the New York papers, stared and gulped. "Janet?"

"Janet. Don't try to flimflam me. She's in it, too—up to her neck."

"You mustn't blame her, dad," the son said earnestly. "It's my fault. I sent for her. You see, I couldn't come in here alone with—with Miss Scott. She needed a woman with her. So I thought of Janet."

"And she came. The one person in the world, next to you, who owes me personal loyalty. Traitors, both of you!"

"So, sir! Janet didn't know what she was up against until she got here, and then she didn't want to stay. We—I talked here into it. She's said all the time that we'd get into trouble. It was just her devotion to us—you and me, I mean—that kept her here, and you mustn't be hard on her for that, dad."

"I don't want any suggestion from you. Confine yourself to facts. I'll deal with Janet when the time comes. Go on."

"But—"

"Go on!"

Deeply troubled by this new angle of responsibility, Piggy went on, and as the narrative proceeded the other's interjections ceased, perishing in the heat of his anger before they were uttered. Even as Roberta had seen Percival Galahad earlier in the day, white and still and outwardly cold, so he saw his father now, at the highest and deadliest stage of Brazenose wrath.

"So—here we are," Piggy concluded.

CHAPTER FORTY-FIVE

"Exactly," answered Brazenose senior. "Here we are. Now I'll tell you where your damned romatic nonsense has put me—and The Business. Just after you left the office that last morning, Scott served notice on me—it amounted to that—that he would either buy us out—buy the Brazenose plant, mind you!—or immediately begin building his own factory to manufacture a new automatic loom combined with his shuttle, leaving us flat. He's canceled the contract."

"Good—Lord!"

"Precisely. Good Lord," Brazenose repeated, icily ironic. "And as you may remember, if you've ever given that much attention to business, there isn't another automatic threader in experience."

"Isn't there one? I remember something about a Boston man—"

"Killigrew. Yes. He's got one—better than Scott's. But he's a fool, like most inventors. Thinks it's going to make his everlasting fortune, and won't sell at any price. His machine isn't right now, and it never will be, because he won't let anybody else touch it and he doesn't know enough to perfect it himself. Two of his devices are better than ours and if we could buy them we'd work miracles. But he won't sell."

"Perhaps, if you saw him now—"

"Thanks. It relieves me to find you taking a belated interest in the source of your income, even if you have no pride in The Business. I'm going to see him—going now, from here—but it won't do any good. We tried him out before making the arrangement with Scott. All he'll ever do will be to cluck around that machine like a hen with one chicken. The only thing that would help us there would be a funeral. Our one real chance of holding our own lies in talking Scott around—and you see what you've done to that."

"But he doesn't know I'm in this, and unless somebody has recognized you here today, he needn't."

"Precisely. He needn't. I'm coming to that. The last time I saw you, I told you that if you didn't cut out this kind of thing I'd disown you, and I meant it. As far as you're personally concerned, I'd throw you out this minute. You've forfeited your last claim to consideration. But now I've got to think of The Business, and for once in your life you've contrived—inadvertently, I admit—to make yourself important to it. So you can come back, on one condition. You'll give me your word that you'll leave here today and have nothing more to do with this Scott affair."

"Dad, you don't understand—"

"Wait. There's an alternative. Either you step out of this thing here and now, and stay out, or I'm through with you for all time. You'd better think twice—if you know how," he added grimly, as Piggy compressed his lips and shook his head. "It means your whole future. I'm offering you one last chance to redeem yourself, but it won't keep. You'll take it here—now—or I'll cut you off without a cent and never see you again."

They stopped walking. Piggy looked at him with miserable eyes, but spoke gently, realizing at last the full consequences of his escapade and his father's travail.

"I don't think you quite see what you're asking, dad. From the time I could talk, you've drilled it into me to stick, even if I was being licked. Not to be a quitter. Well—I've started this and I've got to see it through."

It was Brazenose's turn to look blank. Furious though he was, he had not questioned for an instant that when the alternatives had been clearly stated, the Boy's fundalmental good sense would appear in his choice. Certainly he had not expected his own reiterated precepts to be used against him. In this crisis his ruling passion asserted itself.

"But The Business, Boy, The Business!" he exclaimed. "Don't you understand that the future of The Business is at stake?"

"Yes, sir," said Piggy, steadily. "I see that now—and I'm sorry, dad. I'll do everything I can to protect it."

"You'll get out? Go home?"

"I can't do that, sir. But I'll take good care not to be caught. There's no way of identifying me, because nobody around here knows me. We'll pull it—" He broke off. In the stress of his struggle with his father he had temporarily forgotten Roberta's perfidy. Now it came to him with a shock that both she and Celia knew who he was, and in view of the faithlessness that had shown her to be as other girls, respecting no secret, he lacked assurance that his identity would not be revealed. And for a promise to her, he was to lose his inheritance—and his father. He went on dully: "I've got to finish this job, dad. I can't leave those girls now."

"Girls! Do you mean to say that you put a senseless adventure with a couple of silly chits above what you owe me and yourself—and The Business? You seem to have a high opinion of girls, all at once!"

"Not so high as yours, perhaps," his son returned, with a faint, twisted smile. "They both know who I am, and they're Scotty's daughters. Don't you think they're likely to tell him, if they go back to him?"

"Not if they have ordinary sense," snapped Brazenose, whose plan had been to swear these young women to silence, pointing out to them in unmistakable terms the fealty they owned to the youth who had risked so much for them. The fact that they evidently knew and dreaded their father, acknowledging no loyalty to him, should make this easier of accomplishment. "They got you into this—"

"No, they didn't; I got myself into it. Now I've got to get all of us out. I'll do the best I can, sir. Nobody else shall know, if I can help it. I'll keep my name—and yours—out of it. But I promised to see them through and I've got to do it."

"Then you're no son of mine," said Brazenose harshly. "I'm through with you."

For a second they looked into each other's eyes, neither yielding. Then without a word, the father turned on his receding back for a moment, the son dropped down the wooded bank and plodded with drooping shoulders through underbrush and across a pasture, toward the only home he now had.

The detective, who had been observantly loitering a short distance down the road, advanced to meet the approaching figure, saying in an authoritative tone:

"I want a word with you."

"Get out!" Brazenose strode on, and the other, with a glance over his shoulder to mark the spot where the chauffeur had vanished, kept pace with him.

"How long have you known that young man?"

"None of your damn business. Get out, I tell you!"

CHAPTER FORTY-SIX

Argument poised on the detective's tongue at his rebuff from Brazenose, Sr., but his orders were explicit. Under no circumstances wha he to lose sight of Peter Brown, and in default of an alter ego to perform this duty his choice was limited. Therefore, he, too, plunged down the bank and into the brush, leaving Brazenose to tramp on alone to Fitzwilliam Depot, amid the ruins of his life. The Business was doomed to dwindle, the temple had been desecrated by the son of its high priest, and the Boy—the Boy upon whom all his hopes were set—had failed him.

When the detective had seen Piggy enter the barn, he left his associate of the motor-cycle briefly in charge and hastened to the tavern, where he made inquiries about the stranger. But Brazenose, though observed, had not been identified. The man then called Headquarters, at Jaffrey, by telephone, gave a detailed description of the visitor, and returned to his post.

Roberta, depressed by the quarrel, was sitting with Celia when Piggy returned, pretending to read, but really wondering what there was in a name, however silly, to send him into such a rage, and not a little indignant still over his charge that she lacked honor. But Janet, in the kitchen, saw his approach from an unusual direction and her keen eyes marked the dejection of his mien. When he passed the wndows without a glance and went on to the barn, she hastily dried her hands, threw a cloak over her shoulders, and followed.

She found him sitting on the running board of his car, elbows on knees and head in hands.

"What's come to ye, lad?" she asked.

He lifted a haggard face. "Dad. He's been here. "I've just seen him. He knows all about it and—Janet, he's thrown me over. Turned me out."

"Never!"

"He has. He said I was no son of his. I've got you in bad, too. He—he's through with both of us. Oh, I'm a wonder, I am!"

He dropped his head into his hands again and she sat down beside him, drawing him into her arms.

"Ye're my aim dear laddie," she crooned, as she had a thousand times before when his sins had found him out. "Tell me, noo. Tell Janet."

His head pillowed on that faithful breast, forgetting in his dire need the anger aroused by her revelation to Roberta. Piggy told her the story, complicated tale.

"An' so, because ye'll keep yer word, he cast ye off? Weel, noo, that's wrong o' him. Ye ken, lad, ye've been an awfu' fool. There's no blingin' that. Ye canna blame him for bein' angry. But for a' that, ye're his ain flesh, an' he wasna sae wise himsel'—nir sae set on business, neither—when he waur a lad. Even thirty years ago, when first I knew him—weel, I could telil ye things that he's forgot. Ye're made i' his very image, an' he shouldna cast ye off for that."

He pulled himself away from her and rose, squaring his shoulders.

"Oh, well—he gave me fair notice. He told me what to expect if I got into the newspapers again, and I did it—right away. I knew I was taking chances, too, but I didn't see any other way. He says Bob could have got hold of Celia by law. Well—I can take my medicine. But he's down on you, too. He may stop your pension."

"He'll no do that. Gin he should, I'm no sae aul yet that I canna work. But I'm thinkin' he'll no do that."

Her stanch courage merely made matters worse and Piggy turned away to hide a quiver of hos chin, muttering, "Trere's The Business, too."

"Aye, that's bad. There's no blinkin, lad. Come, noo; come intae the hoose wi' Janet an' eat yer lunch."

Piggy wished no lunch. Neither did he wish to see Roberta. He resisted the old woman's efforts to entice him, and left untouched the plate of food she carried out to him later, though he drank the coffee thirstily. About five o'clock he presented himself at the kitchen door, having first ascertained by peering through a window that Janet were alone.

"I won't be here for dinner."

"Whaur are ye goin' lad?"

'To the devil," said Piggy shortly, as the easiest way to avoid explanations.

A moment later he shot down the road in his car, trailed by the motorcycle man.

MANY FOUND KIN IN FIVE COUNTIES

To what extent are people living in certain communities related to each other by blood or marriage ties, and how much does this "kinship" affect community consciousness and group unity? With this problem in mind, the sociology department at Michigan State college has during the last year conducted a survey of five counties, Ionia, Clinton, Shiawassee, Eaton and Ingham, in which 3,261 families responded to the question: "To how many families within a distance of five miles are you or your family related by blood or marriage as near as or nearer than second cousins?"

According to results of the investigation the households in question were found to be related on an average of 4.5 families. In Clinton county, the average is 6.6 and in Livington county, 3.4. The average for farm families in Eaton county is 3.7; Ingram county, 3.7; Shiawassee, 3.9, and Ionia 4.9.

Farm families, in Westphalia township are quite inter-related. For this township, located in Clinton county, the average was 18.3, while Dallas township, just north of Westphalia, is second, listing 10.6. Portland township, Ionia county, is third.

Of the 3,261 families, 22.9 per cent are not related to any within a radius of five miles; 13.9 are related to but one family; 10.9 per cent to two families; 8.3 to three families; 8 per cent to four; 8 per cent to five; 5.3 per cent to six; 4.2 per cent to seven; 3.4 per scent to eight; 1.8 per cent to nine; 4 per cent to 10; and 9.3 per cent to more than 10 families.

GIRL, 22, ASKS COURT TO FREE HER FROM SISTERS

Frances Besser who spent nine of her 22 years in an orphan asylum and the greater part of the last two working for a sister at $6 a week, has obtained in Detroit from Circuit Judge Arthur Webster an injunction restraining her three sisters and Elizabeth Frase of the Bureau of Catholic Charities from attempting to abridge her freedom.

The sisters are Mrs. Clare Webber who operates a bakery; Mrs. Helen Helfrich, and Mrs. Agnes Parrish.

According to Miss Besser's petition, she left the Webber home last August after working there for two years at $6 a week.

SPRING ATTIRE IS OF PASTEL SHADES

Lovely new apparel is arriving daily and well dressed women who keep abreast of fashion's latest whims are finding the new frocks so alluring that they are purchasing them for immediate wear under the winter coat. The pastel shades which continue popular are fitting harbingers of spring; soft blues, greens, rose, flesh, yellow and the always correct white, brightened with a bit of bright color or chick touches of black. A new shade in fashion's color chart, and one that promises to lead the mode is navy

The "Compose" suit which is really a new name for the ensemble of last year is the last word in style. It consists of an afternoon frock of crepe or georgette with jacket of silk in harmonizing or contrasting color. For sports wear the idea is developed in a crepella dress and a packet of jersey and the every-popular suit made of flannel, tweed or twill has a good looking blouse of silk crepe attached to the skirt so that when the coat is removed the effect of a dress is much more pleasing than the old idea of separate skirt and blouse.

To be fashionable, one's frocks must be of dull materials, for shiny fabrics are taboo in the spring and summer regime. Buttons, and many of them, are seen on afternoon and sports frocks of all colors. Belts are also an important feature in the realm of trimmings and fringe furnishes the medium for smart touches on both gowns and evening coats and wraps.

Patterned tucks are used on the blouse and sometimes on the skirt of the sports and afternoon frocks, and nothing is more effective as trimming on lovely, expensive material. Some of the new gowns depend upon the sleeves to furnish the outstanding feature and in this event the result is very satisfying. Long, tight or comfortably fitting sleeves with a charming puff about four inches above the wrist or at the elbow; sleeves trimmed in Mosaic effect inlay design of self or different colors appliqued. Contrasting collars and cuffs or those of white or cream are again part of the sports attire.

The tiered skirt is less important for spring. Pleated skirts are coming back. Patou uses pleating on all his sports dresses, both on the skirt and jumper. The bloused silhouette is still very much pronounced, bringing with it an enormous vogue for belts. The bolero influence is still strong and also the short packet. Patou drapes the tops of afternoon frocks around the hips with the skirt slightly fuller in front. Evening dresses have uneven hemlines and long fish tails which fall from the shoulder or hip line. The one piece sports frock is favored and is decidedly newer than the jumper dresses. With one-piece dresses cardigan sweaters in the same color are worn.

Wine colors are much lighter in tone and one can detect a slight tinge of brown. Wines are slowly turning into dull rust reds. Old rose with a tinge of beige in another color which is changing. Beige with a flesh tone is used for afternoon and evening wear. But most important is the use of green. One sees green in the soft clear pastel shades, almond green, a soft yellow green and pale olive. For evening it is combined with silver. Dark blue and silver or rose is another color combination. Peach is used for sports wear, also deep flesh tones. Black still is very important for afternoon and evening wear.

The close fitting hat is being worn now and is both comfortable and good looking. Fashioned in either the soft faille silk or bright colors or in dark blue or the ever-smart black and ornamented with a rhinestone pin it is appropriate to wear with any of the lovely new frocks. Felt hats never seem to lose their popularity, but each season are made more intriguing.

POULTRYMEN PLAN AD CAMPAIGN FOR CHICKS

"Accredited chicks are better chicks," advertisements of the Michigan State Poultry Improvement Association will tell poultry men in 1927.

The association's budget, providing for the expenditure of $1,500 or more in paid advertisements to broadcast the merits of Michigan baby chicks, has been approved and farm publications soon will carry the message of the Wolverine hatcherymen.

In addition to the association's advertisements, individual hatcherymen of Michigan have contracted to spend thousands of dollars advertising the merits of their chicks. Hatcherymen have arranged for the most extensive advertising campaign in the history of the baby chick business, and they are preparing to capitalize on the accreditation and certification service given by the poultry department of Michigan by the poultry department of Michigan State College in co-operation with the Michigan Poultry Improvement Association.

A force of carpenters are at work re-modeling the old New York Central freight house in this village where the depot will be removed as soon as possible. It will probably surprise most of our readers to hear this, as the old depot has stood ever since the railroad was built. Owing to the necessity of walking between these two buildings in his work, depot agent Leo Ballard petitioned the company to make the change. The depot will be torn down and rebuilt at some other place along the right-of-way. The removal of this building seems an injury to our village, but it cannot be helped. The fact remains however, that most of the small railroads in the country are losing prestige and this is a deplorable circumstance. Since the railroads had to do with the development of the country long before the gas propelled vehicle was dreamed of, it is with regret that we have to admit the fact. We sincerely hope there is a solution of the problem whereby the railroad companies can handle their own gas motors and stay in the game. There is no justice in the heavy taxation the railroads have to endure while hand-in-hand with taxation stalks a competition more indecent as the years roll on.

A TABLOID HISTORY OF THE RADIO

Great Industry Traced From Its Beginning Shows Remarkable Growth.

In theory, radio is old; in practice, it is still very young.

Over eighty years ago Joseph Henry demonstrated at Princeton that under certain conditions electrical effects are oscillatory, or vibratory, and that these oscillatory effects can be transmitted over considerable distances. Others studied these effects. Numerous experiments were conducted.

Decades later, Professor Heinrich Hertz of Germany demonstrated in a striking manner how the discharge of an electrical condenser sets up invisible waves, and how these waves can be detected several feet distant. That was in 1887. Several years later, Professor Righi of Italy undertook the study of Hertzian waves.

In Righi's laboratory there chanced to be a young student named Guglielmo Marconi, who became intensely interested in the work. He saw a possibility of applying these invisible or Hertzian waves to telegraphy without wires. Soon Marconi was conducting extensive experiments on his father's estate. From a few feet he soon advanced his wireless jumps to miles, using an upright wire and ground connection at the transmitting and receiving ends. From a laboratory experiment, Marconi's efforts passed over to the commercial stage, mainly in England. Year by year Marconi spanned greater distances, while numerous steamships were equipped with wireless apparatus to work in conjunction with land stations. And by 1907 Marconi succeeded in spanning the vast Atlantic, transmitting signals from England to Newfoundland and laying the foundation for world-wide wireless.

By this time many scientists and technicians had been attracted to the virgin field of wireless communication. Originally the invention of Guglielmo Marconi, wireless communication now began to represent the combined efforts of many pioneers. Thus an Englishman, Sir Oliver Lodge,; Dr. M. I. Pupin, an American, and several others contributed the principle of tuning, without which wireless communication would be impracticable. Another Englishman, Professor Flemming, contributed the basic vacuum tube, which was later developed by the American DeForest and ingeniously applied by the young American student, Armstrong. Vacuum tube improvements owe their conception to many American technicians, led by Dr. Irving Langmuir of the General Electric Research Laboratory. Alexanderson, another American, developed a remarkable generator known as the Alexanderson alternator, which made possible reliable and economical radio communication over great distances.

Public Radio Began in 1920

A variation of wireless telegraphy, first tried out two decades ago by the Danish Poulsen, made it possible to transmit the spoken word instead of the dots and dashes of the telegraph code. Up till the World War, however, wireless telephony was crude and impracticable. But the remarkable technical advances made during the trying days of conflict soon placed wireless telephony on a practical basis. Indeed, the Atlantic was experimentally spanned by wireless telephony in 1915, by American telephone engineers, and by the end of the war wireless telephony was available for reliable communication over considerable distances and even on aircraft.

In 1920 the Westinghouse engineers conducted a series of experiments with wireless telephony from a laboratory in East Pittsburgh. Wireless amateurs, then possessing receivers for the purpose of listening to dot-dash messages, were asked to listen in on the wireless telephone experiments. In due course the Westinghouse tests included the transmission of phonograph records; and the novelty of talks and music coming over the air soon caused laymen to buy and install inexpensive radio receivers.

Organized Broadcasting

And having created a large audience for its experimental transmission, the Westinghouse organization soon felt duty bound to place its experiments on a schedule basis. Singers and speakers were now introduced in place of phonograph music. And radio broadcasting came into existence with a rapidity of growth that stands without parallel. From a single experimental station, radio broadcasting grew to hundreds of stations dotting the entire country.

In April, 1919, out of the necessity of centralizing America's wireless or radio efforts, and at the invitation of the United States Government, the Radio Corporation of America was formed. This company immediately purchased the property of the British-owned Marconi Company, secured rights under all important radio patents, and quickly placed in commercial service high-power stations connecting across the Atlantic and Pacific oceans to distant lands. Thus came about our American world-wide network which makes New York and San Francisco the centers of radio communication.

Let's Drive the Poultry Thieves out of Michigan

Stealing chickens, ducks and turkeys from the farms of this State has proven so profitable that we are fighting an organized gang of bandits who use motor trucks to rush their spoils to city markets. It has got to stop.

The Michigan Business Farmer has set aside ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS ($1,000.00) to be paid in rewards to anyone, including state and county police officers, who secures the evidence and conviction of poultry thieves who steal chickens, ducks, turkeys or guinea fowl from its subscribers.

FIRST REWARD PAID

Frank Watkins, R. 2, Holly, Michigan, was paid the first reward under this offer. The thief he caught served 30 days in the Oakland county jail and paid $65 fine. Frank has $50 to show for ridding Michigan of one poultry thief.

A Great Infidal

It is probable that some of our readers know the age of Thomas Edison who has been aptly styled the "Wizard of Menlo Park" for his great accomplishments along the line of electricity, and who was a few years ago rated as a Michigan man—in fact they tried hard to give old Michigan the credit for producing such a wonderful genius. Investigation has shown that Edison was born in Ohio after all, but he came to Michigan at a young age and resided here many years—off and on.

On February 11th Mr. Edison pleasantly celebrated his eightieth birthday at his home and among other distinguised guests was Henry Ford of Dearborn.

It is surprising to hear after this, that Mr. Edison is a blown-in-the-bottle infidal for as he says, "The word God has no meaning to me."

Whether his delving into the mysteries of electricity or his wonderful acquaintance with human nature has made him an unbeliever, nobody knows. As one would expect, Mr. Edison believes the human body is made up of millions of little life cells (probably he means electric cells) which leave at death and go out into the ether. Whether they cease to exist or are absorbed in the air, he does not know.

Edison also says telepathy and spiritualism are all bunk. Edison and Luther Burbank, the plant wizard, both failed to see the immortality or the spirituality of God Almighty. Here at least, are two prominent learned men of this generation who are confessed Infidals but with the best intent to all and maliice toward none.

Machinery Kills Corn Borer

Michigan's corn borer sub-station at Monroe is doing interesting work for the corn belt and perhaps for other crop areas beyond the corn borers, except those in the ears and shelled corn where less than 1 per cent escaped destruction. The ensilage cutter killed them 100 per cent at cutting length from 3-8 to 1-4 inches The corn binders with low cutting attachments got all the borers at the surface. The stubble pulverizer also did a complete job as did the roughage grinder.

FEEDER CATTLE IN STATE DECREASES

The number of cattle on feed in Michigan January 1 was 5 per cent less than one year ago according to a statement issued by L. Whitney Watkins, commissioner of agriculture, and Verne H. Church, U. S. agricultural statistician for Michigan. For the 11 corn belt states the number on feed was 7 per cent less than on the same date last year. Ohio and Indiana reported increases of 10 per cent each, Iowa and Missouri reported an equal number, but all others reported decreases ranging from 5 to 20 per cent. In the far west there was an increase of about 50,000 head in Colorado and a considerable increase in Wyoming, but decreases in the other range states.

The movement of feeders from stockyards into the various states shows little difference in 1926 from 1925, the varying numbers on feed being the changes in those raised locally and those shipped in direct from ranges. Indications point to a larger proportion of calves and light weight cattle on feed than one year ago, which will tend to delay the marketing until after April 1 of a larger percentage than last year.

The trend of prices during the next two months will affect the distribution of marketing, but it seems probable that the supply during the first three months of 1927 will be much lighter than during the second quarter.

Michigan is the most important sheep feeding state east of the Mississippi river, and outranked only by Colorado and Nebraska in the United States. The estimated number of sheep and lambs on feed on January 1 in the state was 330,000 as compared with 253,000 on the same date last year, according to the feeding report issued by Verne H. Church, U. S. agricultural statistician, and L. Whitney Watkins, commissioner of agriculture. There were marked decreases in the western range states and in the range sections of Nebraska and South Dakota, but general increases throughout the corn belt. The gain in the 11 states comprising the corn belt, was approximately 310,000 head or 13 per cent in comparison with one year ago. The decrease in the range sections amounted to 675,000 head.

While the total number being fed is less than that of one year ago, the fact that there is a considerable increase in the corn belt would indicate increased marketings during January, February and March, but a smaller supply for market during April and May than for the corresponding period in 1926.

HUNTER TREED BY BRUIN, HIS STORY

Roy Annett, a Pontiac real estate dealer, while hunting deer in November, stood on a stump watching a runaway.

Hearing a noise behind him, he turned to see a large black bear 10 feet away heading right at him. It came direct to the stump, passed it so close the hunter could have reached down and touched it with his hand; passed on about 10 feet; when, suddenly catching the scent, it stopped, turned and stood erect, staring the Pontiac nimrod direct in the eye.

"It was a real bear," says Annett, "just about the size of those big fellows on Belle Isle." He says he figured that if he had wounded that bear at close quarters, it might have lived long enough to have given him a good mauling, so he dismissed all thoughts of a bear skin rug and let Mr. Bruin continue on his way unmolested.

The black bear, unless cornered, is a well known coward and will run away like a scared cat even when wounded, but it is no foregone conclusion that one wounded at so close quarters, when he could see the object of his attack, might not have resented same to the extent of slapping a hunter into the middle of next week.

A vital shot might have been difficult. A shot through the heart at that distance will not stop a gizzly bear. Hunters generally know the enormous distance a deer can go even after its heart is pierced. How far the black bear could emulate these two is a question. It is one Roy Annett, former superintendent of the Pontiac division of the D. U. R. and present realtor, says he is willing some other hunter shall prove.

20,000 ACRES PLANTED IN PINE AT EAST TAWAS

A record has been set in the Michigan National Forest adjacent to East Tawas when 4,720 acres of pine trees were planted last year. Planting began upon this forest reserve in 1912 and since that time 20,500 acres have become pine covered. The trees are spaced eight feet apart, bringing about 700 trees to the acre.

WHAT YOU BREATHE WHEN IN CITY NOW IS BEING MEASURED

Every time you take a breath in Detroit you inhale 1,000,000 motes. Even during a stroll in the suburbs or the countryside around the city probably 350,000 of these same dust particles enter your lungs. The United States Weather Bureau has completed tests of the difference between country and city air and announces in addition to this computation of motes that their composition varies widely, too.

Country atmosphere dust, according to Dr. Herbert H. Kimball, who made the tests with a machine patterned after the breathing apparatus of the human being, consists of finely powdered mineral matter blown up from the ground, a few salt crystals and, in season, pollen from plants and spores from rusts or molds. Soot and ash are combined with dust from building operations in the city's dust particles, which are about three times the size of those afflicting the country. The motes are said not to be an unmixed evil, however, for without them we would have no condensation, no clouds and no rain.

SAY FLOWERS GIVE SUMMER FOREVER

Perpetual summer for Michigan homes is one of the plans of the Garden Club of Michigan. Mrs. Edwin S. Barbour, president of the club, pointed out the manner by which this Utopian condition might be brought about.

"Summer is our favorite season because of its many growing things, its green trees, song birds and blossoms," she said. "When winter comes, some of us go south to find the summer. Others stay at home and grumble at the weather.

"Both do wrong.

"Too many of us, probably, spend our winters away from home. To come right down to it, we go in search of flowers.

"The home conservatory answers the innate desire for flowers that is born in every one of us. It will be the means of keeping the summer seekers at home and the grumblers from their grouch."

And it will stop many divorces; prevent much quarreling in the home in the winter time, a prominent florist supplements.

"One must make clear at the start, however, the difference between private greenhouses and conservatories," declared Mrs. Barbour. "The former is much more expensive. The latter is not costly at all."

Mrs. Barbour owns a greenhouse. In it she grows all the flowers that adorn her beautiful Grosse Pointe home. Here, too, she prepares plants for spring planting, for the Barbour plot of ground on the lake front extends back more than 500 feet. And, even in the case of a greenhouse, she says, the cost is little more than that of heating the place.

"A conservatory is heated by the house heating plant," she declared. "Of course, one would most likely use potted plants only, because of the necessity of fertilizing the beds. And yet, one can raise almost any variety of plant in a conservatory, say one that connects with the dining room by means of French doors."

Imagine one growing orchids in his own home! Yet, it's possible for almost any home owner.

Have you the patience to wait 40 years for a plant to bloom?

In the conservatories on the Joseph H. Berry estate is a Bird of Paradise plant that is just about ready to burst into bloom after being watched and tended for 40 years.

This is just one of the thrills of growing plants in the home.

MUSKEGON IS NURSE FOR FUTURE GREAT PLANTS

Selecting the small acorns to be grown into mighty oaks, figuratively, is the job of Ralph C. McCrea, industrial investigator for the Muskegon Chamber of Commerce.

Muskegon is trying to attract new industries. To do this the city organized an Industrial Foundation Fund to be used in aiding small manufacturing concerns in getting a start. Merchants and others subscribed $400,000 to the fund and for a year now the city has been working under the plan.

The Continental Motors Corporation, the city's largest industry, started as a small machine shop, having been moved to Muskegon from Chicago by Ross W. Judson. Today it is an $18,000,000 concern, and the largest motor-building plant in the world. The Shaw-Walker and other leading manufacturing concerns of Muskegon started in a small way. Hence, Muskegon has confidence that it can obtain industrial giants of tomorrow by giving aid to small concerns today.

PROGRESS IN FIGHT ON DISEASED CATTLE MARKS PAST YEAR

The year 1926 was one of progress in the campaign for bovine tuberculosis eradication, it is revealed by H. W. Norton, Jr., director of the bureau of dairying, State Department of Agriculture, in his review of the work.

"We look back with considerable satisfaction on the results accomplished," he said. "A total of 63,478 herds, including 488,289 cattle, were tested and 8,629 reactors were found. Thirty-three and three-tenths per cent of all the cattle in the state were tested under State and Federal supervision during the year and only 1.76 per cent infection was found. A brief statement of the status of the work at the beginning and the close of the year shows that great progress was made.

"On Jan. 1, 1926, there were 19 modified accredited counties in Michigan, work was in progress in 15 counties and 22 counties were on the waiting list. Thus 56 counties had adopted the area plan of eradication at the beginning of the year, leaving three Upper Peninsula counties and 24 in the Lower Peninsula in which no action had been taken.

"On Jan. 1, 1927, the modified accredited counties had been increased to 34, work was in progress in 21 counties, with 17 counties on the waiting list. Thus, on Jan. 1, 1927, only 11 counties in the state of Michigan, two in the Upper and nine in the Lower Peninsula, had failed to take action in this important matter. At the same time there were 114,210 herds, including 873,988 cattle, under State and Federal supervision in Michigan, with 57,257 herds representing 494,168 cattle on the waiting list.

"During the calendar year 1925 the testing covered 49,013 herds, including 399,666 cattle, while during the year just closed 63,478 herds and 488,289 cattle were tested. This shows an increase of 22.2 per cent during 1926, as compared with 1925."

WRIT IS WEAPON OF HONEYMOONERS

Usually when a bride and groom start for Niagara Falls, or wherever honeymooners go, they carry along very proudly their marriage certificate, and all other legal papers and other earthly documents are not given much of a place in the trousseau.

But a writ of habeas corpus is one of the sacred papers in the honeymoon portfolio that Gomer C. Workman, Ford worker of Detroit, and his bride, 17 years old, who was Gladie Gerlach, took with them on their wedding trip, which is more or less of a "hide-out," too, from the search of the law.

Several weeks ago Workman came home with a bride.

Things went along nicely until a few days ago, when the bride's mother, Mrs. Louanna Gerlach of Shelbyville, Mich., appeared on the scene and had Gladie taken into custody.

Workman went to a lawyer and the lawyer advised him to start habeas corpus proceedings. He did.

However, it does not appear that the honeymooners are going to have much more trouble, for the girl's mother seems disposed to let the matter rest in status quo, habeas corpus.

CITY'S 3 BILLION WASTE IS SAVED

Detroit supports a small army of men who salvage the three billion dollars it throws into the alleys each year.

Not all, nor even a large percentage of the city's junk business, aggregating millions yearly, represents waste, say spokesmen for the 1,500 Detroit junk collectors.

Detroit housewives are a thrifty, frugal lot. They get all the traffic will bear in the sale of old papers and rags, scrap iron and tin and worn-out automobile tires. Many of them are shrewd bargainers and well posted on market prices.

In the matter of foodstuffs, investigation discloses, however, that women of Detroit have much to learn from their European sisters. Detroit's garbage pail is an expensive luxury.

Almost every householder collects and sells old papers which accumulate in the home. Rags and such waste usually are thrown into the alley, or if enough is collected to make the sale worth while, sold to the junkman, who gets it in either case. If it is thrown out into the alley, he will pick it up on his rounds and eventually sell it to the wholesaler, who in turn sells it to various paper companies, where it is turned into paper. Much of the roofing and building paper, and much of the finest linen paper used for correspondence is made from rags.

It cost the city more than $2,250,000 to keep Detroit clean in 1926. The average householder has no idea of what happens to the rubbish and kitchen refuse after he takes it into the alley, and after the junkman has sorted through it for stuff that can be reclaimed. The chances are that if one were to tell the citizen that he later washed the dust from his hands with a product of this same refuse he would look at his informant with that deep compassion and polite curiosity with which the well-bred face the prevaricator and the halfwit. Nevertheless, it is quite true that one of the basic greases used in the manufacture of soap is extracted from garbage, and that most of the residue is turned into fertilizer.

MIND TESTS HIT IN SANITY PROBE

The idea that a person's sanity can be determined by mentality tests is an altogether wrong one, in the opinion of Dr. David K. Clark, who has charge of the medical division of Receiving hospital, Detroit, and who is a nationally known psychiatrist.

"I do not conclude what I am supposed to from a test that says a policeman doing only good for society has a mental age of twelve while a man who preys on society and lives at its expense has a much higher mental age," he said.

"In my opinion there is only one true test to determine whether or not persons are insane. Find out if, when given proper conditions, they can contribute as much to society as they take away from it. If they can they are sane and it is unjust to call them anything else. If they cannot they must be considered insane regardless of how high they may register in mentality tests."

The idea that queer actions, unusual thoughts and out of the way ways of speaking on the part of an individual necessarily mean that he or she is insane is founded on an erroneous theory, according to Dr. Clark. That can usually be traced to the slowing down of some mental facility. Such a person's mind, he said, might be slow on the perception, recording, recalling or the comparing of thoughts, and yet might have the various instincts such as those of sociability, affection, honesty or religiousness and so from a practical standpoint the person would be entirely sane and able to give to society as much as it took from it.

Another individual, he said, might rate high on the mentality tests and yet be entirely lacking in honesty or affection and so must be considered insane.

SUES OVER ESTATE MADE AT DODGE PLANT SITE

The estate of Heinrich Rrbitter, who for many years operated a celery farm on the present site of the Dodge Brothers, Hamtramck plant, was at issue in a case before Judge Charles B. Collingwood, of Lansing, in the Wayne Circuit Court.

Arbitter died Feb. 26, 1926, at the age of 86, leaving his $20,000 estate to his son, Fred, to the exclusion of his three other children, John, Michael and Mrs. Margaret Hopp. They contend that Fred Kept the father in seclusion, refusing to allow them to see him. They declare Fred influenced their father against them. It is also alleged that when Arbitter made the will in 1923, he was incapable because of deafness.

Fred Arbiter says his father gave each of the other children $5,000 when he sold the celery farm.

ONE-ARMED TRAPPER BAGS SIXTY-EIGHT WOLVES AND COYOTES

Another record has been established by Sam Bennett, one-armed state trapper, of the Upper Peninsula. Bennett accounted for 78 of the larger predatory animals in the last seven months of 1926. Of this number 68 were wolves or coyotes. This is almost one for every three days.

CRIME TAKES BIG LEAD IN DETROIT

In the years 1920 to 1926 inclusive, thugs, with robbery as the motive, killed 125 citizens of Detroit. Since 1922 the killings by holdup men have steadily increased, from five in 1922, to 16 in 1923, to 25 in 1924, to 26 in 1925 and to 28 in 1926.

The records of the Police Department show the same steady increase over the period of 1922 to 1926 in holdups. The holdups for the years 1920 to 1926, inclusive, totaled 4,758. In 1922 they were 483. In 1923 the holdups increased to 615. In 1924 the holdups jumped to 805, dropping back to 703 in 1925, but increasing again to 783 in 1926.

In 1920 there were 965 holdups, but that was a year of business depression. In 1921, when employment was generally open to any man who would work the holdups decreased to 404, but Detroit's prosperity began to attract vicious types from all over the country and by 1922, the holdups had increased to 483, with subsequent increases as noted above.

In the years 1920 to 1926 there were total killings of all kinds, including crimes of passion, but in each case noted by the police as a felonious assault, of 906. The same curve is noted in the chart for the homicides as for other crimes. From a high total of 107 in 1920, the homicides dropped to 80 in 1921 and to 66 in 1922.

But in 1923 the killers increased their work to 137. In 1924 the total homicides were 138, in 1925 totaled 153, and in 1926 jumped to the astounding total of 225, an increase of 72 in 12 months.

$922,231,000 TAX ON U. S. MOTORISTS

American motorists were assessed the staggering total of $922,231,000 for owning and operating their automobiles during 1926, according to a compilation of reports from the various states.

Motor vehicle taxes total $735,226,000, according to reports from all the states, while gasoline taxes stopped all former years with $187,005,000, the latter total being computed from the reports from 29 states and records from the Sinclair, Standard, Texas and other oil companies in the remaining 19 states.

The vehicle taxes were divided about equally between the state and city vehicle taxes and the government's luxury tax on the sale of automobiles. A significant feature of the compilation is that the grand total of $922,231,000 is only slightly less than the estimated expenditure of $1,000,000,000 by all the states and the government during the year for road and maintenance.

The compilation also reveals that the number of registered automobiles in the United States in 1926 furnished a new high total with 22,330,000. Two states, New York and California, each registered more than 1,500,000, while three others, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois, went well over the 1,000,000 mark, but did not reach 1,500,000. Nevada registered the least, slightly less than 23,000.

NORMAL ALUMNI ERECT BUILDING

Appointment of an executive campaign committee is the beginning of a $500,000 campaign among alumni of the Michigan State Normal college to build a college union building at Ypsilanti.

Clarence E. Gittins, mayor of Highland Park, has been named chairman of the campaign committee. Associated with him will be F. W. Frostic, superintendent of schools at Wyandotte, vice chairman; Mrs. Dessalee R. Dudley, assistant superintendent of schools at Battle Creek, vice chairman; Professor Ella M. Wilson of the Normal college, chairman of publicity; Professor H. Z. Wilber, alumni secretary, chairman of organization; Registrar C. P. Steimle of the college, chairman of lists; Professor E. A. Lyman, of the college, chairman of faculty and students; D. L. Quirk, Jr., Ypsilanti, chairman of community committee; H. R. Keyworth, superintendent of schools at Hamtramck, chairman of speakers; President Charles McKenny of the college, Miss Frances Brown, and Robert E. Barber, Highland Park, president of the alumni association.

The alumni building would contain alumni offices, sleeping accommodations for visitors, and a dining room. It also would house the campus literary societies, art, history and dramatic clubs, the Men's union and Women's league. The project is under the auspices of the Alumni association.

An electrical device has been perfected for advertising purposes which projects beams of colored light from powerful lamps forming letters against low-hanging clouds.

WOUNDED DOUGHBOY BECOMES RADIO WIZARD WHILE BEDRIDDEN

Charles Dunn, former doughboy who is bedridden for life as the result of an accident in the Argonne, has emerged from physical and financial wreck as a superheterodyne sage and wizard of the "Nine-in-Line Nighthawk."

Dunn, who lives in Detroit with his aged mother and a handicapped brother, was in the tank corps. Eight years ago, during an American advance, he left his tank to repair some damage which impeded the monster's progress. He did his job under shell fire and, as the tank started up again, its nose struck him in the spine.

He has been paralyzed below the pelvic region since that time. He has been treated by 400 doctors in a score of hospitals. Finally his condition is pronounced incurable. The government gives him $105 a month as pension, $50 goes for a nurse.

To occupy his time, nurses sought to teach him basket and bead work. This man of 200 pounds, six feet in height, found the work petty. He turned to the construction of radios.

When he started he could hardly cut thin wire with pliers. Now his hands and wrists have developed abnormal strength and he works rapidly.

42 YEARS AGO ASKED JOB AS COP, STILL HAS IT

For 42 years Timothy Madigan has worn the blue coat and brass buttons of a police officer, and he is still on duty daily at the Grand Rapids police headquarters—the city's oldest employe in years of service.

On March 5, 1885, when the city was just beginning to arouse interest as a furniture center, "Tim" called at the old station near the river—torn down years ago—and asked for a job. He has been on the force ever since.

Mystery of Radio Yet to Be Solved

"Winter Blanketing," Fading Static, "Dead Spots," Not Understood.

There is still plenty of mystery in radio. What do we know about the "winter blanketing" that interfered with reception last year, or about fading and static? The use of radio for controlling mobile bodies and the transmission of light, heat and power may be possible. But, excepting the controlling of mobile bodies, few experiments even have been carried on in these special problems. Short-wave transmission, the latest economical and practical means of communication, is still not thoroughly understood or mastered.

Engineers Are Puzzled.

Most engineers admit that we know little about what happens in the ether after a message leaves the station until it is received at another point, and in this field alone considerable research must be carried out. Only a short time ago several congressmen indulged in a vigorous debate over what "ether" was, and as a result the word, usually used to describe the media through which radio waves are sent, was left out of proposed legislation, since the congressmen could not agree on what it was.

Among a few of the other mysteries of radio which still withstand the efforts of science are the effects of the Aurora Borealis and sun spots on radio and the cause of the so-called dead spots, where reception of practically any type of radio waves seems impossible.

Radio for Many Uses.

The adaptation of radio has been applied to many practical uses besides ordinary communcation. It is used to operate relays which throw switches in power houses at considerable distances from the main plant; it is used in several ways to aid navigators of the sea and air, and is now being adapted to railroads as a means of control and as a safety device. It is also found of great benefit in transmitting time signals practically throughout the world, which enables scientists and explorers to establish accurately points on the surface of the earth. Its use in peace is general, and its use in war includes many applications besides for communication, which the military and naval authorities will not reveal or discuss.

Although many practical uses have been found for radio, there are many possibilities which only the far-sighted scientists can predict and only the skilled and experienced engineers can carry out.

FARRELL, VETERAN COACH, BELOVED

Few athletic coaches in America are as widely known and loved as "Steve" Farrell, University of Michigan track coach, whose whole life has been spent as a runner and instructor. Though a grandfather in years, he is as much a boy in spirit and overflowing vitality as any one of his pupils.

"Steve" was never an amateur. Back in the old fire department days in New England, Farrell used to race with hook and ladder teams. Such oldsters as Mike Murphy and Keene Fitzpatrick were his rivals. Steve's exploits were many and varied. At one time, he used to race against a horse in the Barnum & Bailey circus (incidentally beating the pony regularly) and twice he entered the famous Sheffield Handicap in England, once winning it and its purse of $10,000.

Farrell has developed many a champion and is keeping on doing so, as witness Michigan's championships of the Big Ten in track during the past decade. Farrell's exploits and experiences would fill a volume, but it is the man himself who is just as interesting.

Farrell has one of the keenest senses of humor in the country. He has a grin and a smile and a twinkle of the eye that makes you a life long friend in two minutes flat. He has kept fit and he keeps his track pupils just as fit.

Farrell and Yost make a great pair. One talks football while the other talks track, but beneath the current of their talk there is understanding, sympathy and co-operation.

MANISTEE STREAMS HEAVILY STOCKED FOR SPRING FISHING

If anglers, going forth in the dim hours of dawn to whip the lakes and streams of Manistee county next summer, fail to fill their baskets and stringers, it won't be the fault of Isaac Walton League chapter, No. 22, nor of the state conservation department.

A check-up of all the various departments shows that probably one million fish were introduced into the lakes and water courses of this vicinity.

A total of 181,500 brook trout fry were placed in the rivers and streams during the past year as follows: Pine Creek pond, $3,000; Pine creek, 22,000; feeder to Pine creek, 4,000; Pine creek outlet, 6,000; Clay Banks creek, 16,000; Cedar creek, Norman, 12,000; Cedar creek, Maple Grove, 16,000; Podunk creek, 10,000; Sickle creek, 6,000; Chief creek, 22,000; Little Beacer, 4,000; Second creek and tributaries, 22,000; First creek and headwaters, 4,000; Bear creek, 4,000; Cold Spring, 4,000; Leuchers and branch, 9,000; Burns, 3,500; Shimke, 3,500; Olsen, 3,500; Olsen, 3,500; Rackon, 3,500; Farr, 3,500.

Advanced brown trout fry were placed in Boswell, 8,000; Chieken, 6,000; Williamson, 2,000; Big Beaver, 4,000; Cedar, 10,000, and Little Bear, 1,000; a total of 40,000.

There were 285,000 rainbow fry planted. In Betsy river, 60,000; Pine river, 25,000; Bear creek, 50,000; Bear Creek, Springdale, 50,000; Manistee river, between Junction and Hodenpyl dams, 50,000, and Manistee river, 50,000.

Many of the lakes of the county were stocked with large and small mouth black bass, wall-eyed pike and one planting of perch was made.

FORD COLLECTION MARKS PROGRESS

When a small boy collects marbles, tops, old knives, tags from plug tobacco, old campaign badges and a little red hen, there are two emotions filling the youngster's breast—the joy of possession, and pure enjoyment of variety and color of objects.

If an old man, of great wealth, goes into the market and bids up the price of a Whistler or Corot original, in most instances he is merely the small boy repeating. He is vieing with his fellow rich bidders for the honor of paying the highest price for something the intrinsic value of which is not within many thousands of what he pays for it, and to a certain extent—often not greatly—he enjoys the beauty of the thing bought and added to his "collection."

But when a man of great financial resources buys anything and everything pertaining to human progress on this earth, from ancient lamps used 4,000 years ago to wayside inns of the past century, there must be another motive back of the buying, and the motive discloses the inner man.

The most significant thing about the Henry Ford museum collection of many thousands of transportation, lighting, musical, agricultural and fireside antiques, is what the collection DOES NOT contain.

Mr. Ford has never sought a thing that was designed and used to take human life.

There are no swords, spears, guns, daggers, cannon, battleships or diplomats in Mr. Ford's collection. He has never sought these instruments of disturbance of peace on earth. There are a few old pistols and shotguns in the collection, but these have been sent in by their former owners as donations to the museum. They are few in number and represent one of the methods by which early Americans provided their food.

In fact, the surprise of finding a wall covered with old-style sleigh bells and Conestoga wagon bells right next to an old straw hat, built in the high plug style of a century ago, and this close to a collection of old lamps, some of them dating back to the time when Moses was left in the dark among the bulrushes by the Nile—this surprising contra-position of the thousands of things in the collection is a part of the pleasure of visiting the collection as is.

Here is an old threshing engine, built some 50 years ago by the Ypsilanti Machine Works. It stood for 39 years in a field near Dearborn—sank into the ground far enough for a young maple tree to grow up and entwine its roots and part of the trunk in the wheel spokes.

One of the interesting objects in the collection of agricultural machinery is a Wood, Taber & Morse threshing and traction engine built about 1870, in Eaton, N. Y. This was, and is, a sturdy old machine. It has a four-wheel drive. Its transmission for traction purposes consists of a train of spur gears strung along the side of the horizontal boiler, from fore to aft, and would get a tremendous auto-laugh out of modern engineers. But the old engine did valiant service. It worked.

If Mr. Ford were to evince extra enthusiasm over any part of the exhibit it would probably be for the first Ford automobile, just as he built it in 1892-'93, the kind that wound up on the side, had a handlebar for steering, but could get there at the rate of 30 miles an hour, and chugged merrily with its two cylinders.

Frances Eldridge, 8-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Claude Eldridge, of Orange township, Ionia, holds a record of not being absent or tardy for the school year and she has to walk back and forth a distance of two miles.

KELLOGG TABS SENTIMENT ON GULL LAKE PRESERVE

George C. McKay, treasurer of the Kellogg company, mailed letters to two hundred Gull lake property owners explaining W. K. Kellogg's plan to make that lake a bird sanctuary. Property owners are requested to state whether they are in favor of Mr. Kellogg's plan.

It is explained by Mr. Kellogg that in order to make Gull lake a bird sanctuary it will be necessary for the state conservation department to prohibit hunting there. In obtaining the no hunting decree, he continued, it will be necessary to obtain almost a unanimous consent of property owners about the lake.

The sanctuary will be similar to that maintained by Jack Miner at Kinksville, Ont., if established. Mr. Kellogg plans, it is said, to place at least one pair of every kind of bird in the sanctuary.

ADRIAN GAS CO. TO SPEND $200,000 EXTENDING SERVICE

With plans approved and contracts let, the Citizens Gas Fuel company of Adrian has under way a construction program which calls for the expenditure of nearly $200,000.

As soon as weather conditions permit work will start on the erection of an entire new gas plant, 70 by 85 feet and 75 feet high, with modern equipment. The plant will increase the company's capacity 50 per cent.

With the completion last fall by the city of a new sewer system at a cost of over $300,000 and the erection of a power line from Toledo to Adrian by the Doherty interests at a cost of over $500,000, public utility improvements for Adrian have passed the million dollar mark during the last year.

FLOWERS ENRICH WORLD HAY CHAMP

Arthur W. Jewett, Jr., four times hay champion of the world and grower of some of the country's best grain and corn, makes his living by following a boyhood hobby.

Arthur grew up on his father's farm near Mason, and when he wasn't needed to help with the general farm work, he was busy in his own garden.

The one thing about this garden that fascinated him more than anything else was the mysterious power of a tiny seed to put worth roots and stems which in their growth obeyed a hidden law. Why were the plants from some seeds tall and from others that looked exactly like them, short? Why were some strong and hardy while others were scarcely able to stay alive? Why was the yield from some seeds much greater than from others? Why did a seed grow at all? What was this marvelous life principle that was locked within them?

Seeds, he felt sure, were in some way bound up with the great riddle of the universe.

So his garden became much more than a place to raise a few radishes and carrots. It was a storehouse from which he might induce Nature to yield new treasures.

When he was 18 years old, Arthur exhibited his products for the first time at a corn show at Mason. The following year he exhibited at the show held by the Michigan Crop Improvement Association at East Lansing.

He decided he wanted to go to college. But his father "didn't think much of these college-bred farmers," and intimated that if Arthur was to go through college he'd have to put himself through. Arthur accepted the challenge and entered Michigan State College, then "M. A. C." To earn his way he did all sorts of odd jobs. He played a piano in a movie theater. He played in a dance orchestra. Then he began writing for the farm magazines. In his last two years in school he wrote 100 articles.

Meanwhile, there had been a war, and Jewett had interrupted his college course by enrolling under the American colors. He was placed on special duty in Chicago with the fuel and forage division of the Army.

It was this experience which gave Jewett the rare skill in judging hay and grain which now enables him to win prizes at the International Hay and Grain Show at Chicago.

Although Jewett has gained his greatest reputation as a grower of champion hay and grain, flowers are the principal source of his income.

ILLUSTRATED SONG BORN IN MICHIGAN

As a matter of poetic justice there should be a large red day in our calendar dedicated to the anniversary of the birth of the illustrated song. But this can never be, for the originator of the idea, living now in Detroit with a host of precious memories of his trouping days to keep him company, doesn't remember just when the whole thing happened.

The circumstances are still fresh in his mind and you will be astounded and perhaps gratified to know that the illustrated song owes its being and its very remarkable career to that sterling antique of the kerosene lamp era, "Ten Nights in a Barroom."

Of the once famous pair, Mr. and Mrs. G. Lote Silver, of Detroit, Mr. Silver, a gentle-voiced, mild-mannered man, becomes eloquent only when he is on his favorite topic, the sentimental ballad of another and a kinder day. Mrs. Silver goes about the home with a gentle efficiency and as she busies herself with her simple domestic tasks, she hums snatches of old songs, tender fragments of love lyrics she sang with her husband back in those heroic nineties.

They were The Silvers then, the original and the great singers of illustrated songs, and their names were found on the variety billings from coast to coast, along with Sam Bernard and Camille D'Arville and Blanche Ring and Lew Dockstader and Lydia Titus and other stalwarts of the time.

The time is the remote eighties and the place Kalkaska, Mich. The Silver Family Concert Company was giving a show. To get the background of all this, you must be informed that the Silver Family Concert Company was five in all. There was the father, Dick Silver, the mother, and three sons, Bert, James and G. Lote Silver. From 1870 until into the early nineties this family toured the middle-western states. There wasn't a nook or corner of the great commonwealth of Michigan where they had not been. They came into the state right after the Chicago fire, and for a long time made their headquarters in Grand Rapids. They were pioneer performers in the lumber camps and even ventured far into the north among the miners of the Upper Peninsula.

And so we find them in Kalkaska giving a show. There was to be some fiddling by Father Silver (in his younger days he had been a director of a big orchestra in Boston), there was to be singing and the big sensation of the evening was to be stereoptican slides showing the Johnstown Flood and the marvellous play, "Ten Nights in a Barroom."

The lumberjacks and the riverdrivers had gathered in numbers, and in those days a considerable gathering of lumberjacks and riverdrivers was an event likely to be followed by affairs of large consequence. They were rough in their ways, but their sentimental streak was wide and easy of appeal. And so when the stereoptican slides portraying the great prohibition preachment, "Ten Nights in a Barroom," were thrown before them, they were strangely moved. Not one of them had the slightest sympathy with the underlying purpose of the play, but all of them were profoundly stirred by the vast sufferings of the Morgan family, and particularly touched by Mary Morgan, the little girl whose lyric plea failed to win her sodden father from the clutches of the demon rum.

It was just here in the play that the young G. Lote Silver conceived his remarkable idea. Why not, thought he, raise my tenor voice in song while these lumbermen are gazing at the scene wherein Mary is endeavoring to coax father from the barroom back to his home? He did just that very thing. To the great astonishment of the other Silvers and the vast delight of the assembled lumberjacks, the Silver tenor went into a tremulous exposition of that famous ballad beginning, "Father, Dear Father, Come Home With Me Now."

And right there in Kalkaska, Mich., in the dim eighties, in the presence of many lumberjacks who had come to scoff, but who remained to weep, was born in all its majesty the illustrated song.

The Curse of Prohibition

"Holiday Liquor Hard to Get" says a headline. "Poison Whisky Floods Market," says another head in the same paper. What a terrible thing this prohibition is, how ruthlessly it endangers the lives of many of our best citizens! How it has devastated the country, how cruelly it has crushed many an industry! No pure, reliable holiday bootleg that honest people may rely upon. It's a sad situation. This curse of prohibition, look what its done to the country. In the first place, it has entirely broken up and scattered that beneficient organization, — The Bartenders Union. Men of spirits they were, all of them; jolly fat gentlemen in their white aprons; wonderful mixers, too. Gone, all gone is the grand old Bartenders Union.

Prohibition has indeed crushed our industries. Thousands of mint growers had to go out of business when prohibition killed the mint julep. Nobody uses mint now except Mr. Wrigley, and a few cooks who serve it with spring lamb. Prohibition has almost ruined our policemen. Once they got some healthful exercise hauling drunks to the lockup. Now they have nothing to do.

Prohibition is hard on the poor justice of the peace, also. Once many prisoners appeared before him for drunkenness. That suited him fine. It encouraged his generosity, it enabled him to make many a man a present of thirty days.

This prohibition has just about wrecked us. It has left us with little to do in hours of leisure except maybe fall in love, or get married, send the children to school, join the church, go to the theatre three times a week, race up and down the roads in expensive automobiles, and store our money away in dusty bank vaults, instead of depositing it with cheerful, plump gentlemen, who used to stand behind long, mahogany bars and inquire solicitously, "What'll yuh have?"

"Prohibition." Can one pronounce the word without trembling to think of the wrongs it has heaped upon us? Ah, how it has wrecked life, generally! Once you saw long lines of men on Saturday night going joyfully into crowded rooms where the doors swung open both ways, where there was saw dust on the floor and a merry throng standing around the bar, where men were treating, standing with arms around each others' neck, slobbering on each other's shoulders and assuring each other they were "Th' besh dum frensh in th' worl."

How quickly and willingly a man could get his pay check cashed in those places and the accommodating man in the white apron would even help him to spend it right there so he wouldn't have the bother of taking any of it home Yes, indeed, he could easily spend the whole thing right there on his "dum good frensh" and then bring joy to his household by going home and smashing the furniture.

Prohibition, —think how its curse has blighted the lives of even the dear little ones. It's taken away from them the funny, amusing spectacle of their father coming wabbling up the steps with a nearly empty quart bottle in his hand, all ready to bat them over the head with it. No more can they hope to feel the soft caress of father's drunken kicks on the seats of their poor little pants.

And the wife! Think what prohibition has done to the poor wife! Where once her husband came home with empty pockets at 2 a. m. and slugged her on the jaw and beat her or chased her around the kitchen with the butcher knife, she now no longer has this pleasant little entertainment to look forward to at the end of the week. Now her husband comes straight home from work and she has all the bother of taking his pay envelope and deciding just how it shall be spent.

As for the men themselves, this prohibition has crushed them, It has just changed them from carefree, Saturday night citizens, full of "personal liberty," to poor, helpless creatures, steeped in gloom.

You see them going gloomily into the butcher shops to get tenderloin steaks, and then proceeding moodily home with a load of oranges, cottage cheese, tripe, bologna, candy, cigars and fixings for a big Sunday dinner next day. How deplorably different this from the old-time "load" that man used to take home on Saturday nights! You know instinctively there will be no hilarity in the home that night and nothing to cheer the lives of the little family group like there was in the good old days when papa chased mamma with the knife or put on a hilarious knock down vaudeville act to amuse the dear little ones.

No, they are gone, them grand old days and nights and this wreched, home-wrecking prohibition is all to blame. There is nothing for that family to look forward to on Sunday now, nothing but a great big Sunday dinner and after it a ride in the family sedan.—The Union Signal.

State Report Shows Club Work Benefits

Eighteen thousand six hundred and sixty three Michigan boys and girls were members of boys and girls clubs in 1926, according to the annual report just released by A. G. Kettunen, state club leader. Club work was carried on in all Michigan counties except eight.

During the twelve years that this type of training for Michigan youngsters has been carried on, there have been 215,752 members of boys and girls clubs in this state Enough time has elapsed since the initial clubs were organized so that a measure can be taken of the value of the work to club members in their future activities.

Many of the club members go to colleges, universities, or the normal schools after they have finished club work. These former members find that the training which they received in raising stock, in growing crops, in canning, or in making clothes has a great deal of direct value.

A majority of the former club members, however, do not go on to college after they have finished their high school courses, and these club members, who are men and women now, are almost without exception leaders in their communities. They are still interested in club work and act as local leaders for the clubs of today.

There are several good herds of pure bred stock in the State which had their inception in the livestock club work. Boys are beating their fathers in the raising of many field crops now, and the lessons they learn in crop club work are proving valuable assets to Michigan. Many of the girls preserve food by the hundred cans and get valuable training in the cost, making, and care of clothing.

Farm Bureau Legislative News

Capital punishment, control of lobbyists, highway finance, state income tax, investigations of the Chelsea Cement plant, and other issues of front page importance are contributing to the interest and intensity of the daily sessions of the State Legislature.

The Senate has passed an anti lobbying bill which provides "that any person who is a lobbyist shall be denied the right of admission to the floor," whenever the Senate is in session. House debating a similar rule and has set Wednesday afternoon Feb. 16 for final consideration of this matter.

Rep. David H. Brake of Fremont is sponsoring a bill to prevent hunting on enclosed lands, farm lands or farm woodlots connected there with, without the written consent of the owner or lessee of such land.

Considerable stiffening of the grades for Michigan apples is proposed in a bill introduced in the House by Rep. Luther E. Hall of Ionia, chairman of the House committee on Horticulture. This bill would materially decrease the tolerance in the various grades for apples lacking proper color and having other defects.

A proposal that beginning at the April election in 1929 Supervisors be elected for two-year terms is embodied in the constitutional Amendment introduced by Sen. Vincent a Martin of Fruitport.

Pruning a lot of dead timber out of the laws of Michigan is the purpose of a bill by Sen. Howard F. Baxter of Grand Rapids which would repeal 140 obsolete acts and parts of acts constituting 715 sections.

Sen. Norman B. Horton of Lenawee Co. has a bill providing $200,000 of state funds for each of the next two years for corn borer control. President Coolidge has recently signed a bill passed by congress appropriating $10,000,000 for this purpose and providing that the federal government will match state money 5 to 1. Thus if Michigan provides $200,000 there will be a million dollars of Federal money available for the corn borer battle in Michigan. A proposal by Sen, Herbert J. Rushton of Escanaba that $160,000 be appropriated to provide an executive mansion so that the Governor might have a home while in Lansing. O. C. Holcomb, Minute Man of Adams Township.

Capital Punishment Again

Inside information comes to us that some kind of a capital punishment law is going to pass the law making body, so we cannot refrain from some remarks on the subject. In the first place it is a fact that men who favor capital punishment do not desire it for the thrills. They are not to be classed in the brutal squad, but they agree the method should be as painless as psssible, and should be by means of gas or the electric chair. They are unflinchingly and piously in favor of putting an object lesson before the criminals of the state. but no officer of the law wants to be the executor. The job will have to be done by a man as a profession. This professional executioner will not be known to those outside the courts.

As previously stated in these columns a few public hangings would cut down the percentage of murders. If every proven murderer (other than circumstantial evidence) should be hanged upon the highest hill in Jackson within sight of all who came, with as much ceremony as possible, it would cause fear in the hearts of malefactors.

Michigan's last capital punishment took place in 1824 at Detroit. Steven Simmons was executed for killing his wife while he was in a drunken condition. The Sheriff, an acquaintance of Simmons, positively refused to do the hanging and "Uncle Ben" Woodward, proprietor of a hotel, volunteered and was accepted by Gov. Cass to uphold the dignity of the law. The condemned murderer was a man of superb nerve through and through and the affair made a very deep impression on the assembled crowd, hundreds of whom had driven long distances as they would do to-day. The regimental band were in attendance and rendered a dirge, the prisoner made a speech and sang a hymn just before he was swung off. It is a matter of history that the impression created was lasting and deep. Learned Judges tell us that severity of punishment has no bearing on crime. Go and talk it to the marines!

Misfortune followed the family of "Uncle Ben." Twenty years after he had officiated at the execution of Simmons his son was instantly killed by the explosion of a steamboat boiler at the wharf. The body was hurled high in air.

Casper J. Lingerman, Detroit realtor, in his talks over the radio, gives us some original dope on the StLawrence Waterway scheme He says in olden times when the hunters and the hounds went out to hunt foxes there were not an abundance of fox, so they chased the fox until he was about all in — and then allowed him to escape for another days sport. The dogs were led off his trail by a herring at the end of a string dragged across the fox's track. This was called "dragging a red herring" and Mr. Lingerman compares this with the big-mouth propaganda of the New Yorkers who are trying to flim-flam the middle west into believing that the All-American route across New York and down the Hudson is the logical way. The committee of expert engineers reported on the comparative costs of the two routes and they found no water power available on the New York route and eighty bridges to overcome; channel so narrow and shallow that ocean freighters could not travel under their own power. while on the St Lawrence waterway thousands of horse power are available for hydro-electric purposes, only eight bridges are encountered. The cost of the latter is much less, and not so many locks to be constructed. Their cry of "All-American" is pure bunk, since more than half the distance —from Chicago to Detroit—must be negotiated in Canadian channels to avoid expensive dredging. You and I, and all of us must do our bit in building sentiment along this line.

Committee To Study State Tax Problems

Local taxation within the state and ways and means of insuring more efficient use of such taxes will be the subject of special inquiry by a "citizens" committee appointed here last week as the result of a tax conference held at M. S. C.

Many of the tax paying interests of Michigan had representatives at the Feb. 9 meeting which was addressed by authorities from Indiana. Methods by which the Hoosier state has been able to reduce local tax levies were discussed by Philip Zoercher and Harry Meisse, members of the Indiana Tax Commission.

The representative committee of Michigan taxpayers, appointed to study local tax questions, includes the following: chairman, Melvin B. McPherson, Lowell Farm Bureau; Frank Peterson, Rockford (State Supervisors Association); N. P. Hull, Lansing (Grange); John Doelle, Lansing (Michigan Real Estate Assoc.); W. H. Burnham, Adrian (Manufacturers Assoc.); C. E. Bement, Lansing (League of Municipalities); C. L. Glasgow, Nashville (Retail Merchants Assoc.); Lent D. Upson, Detroit (Bureau of Governmental Research); Carlos J. Jolly, Detroit (General Motors).

PINEAPPLE A PIQUANT TEA-TIME RELISH

SINCE the days when the American colonies declined tea at Boston harbor, the English have looked askance at the American's negligence in the matter of making tea at the proper time. On this side of the ocean we have a bad habit of being too busy for four o'clock tea.

Yet we have to admit that the English have solved the problem of the zero hour—that time when the busy part of the afternoon is far behind and dinner and the pleasures of the evening afar off—by making it a time for a tete-a-tete and tea.

Many Americans have adopted the custom, but others maintain they have no time for it. If the housewife knew how simple it is to have at hand the dainty muffins and decorative tarts that, with tea, make up the tea hour, perhaps the rest of the family would find that after all they aren't so busy as they thought, and that a cup of tea and a bit to eat afford relaxation as well as an opportunity for companionship.

Pineapple has found its way into tea dishes more and more of late, since it has been discovered that the tart taste of Hawaiian pineapple is particularly delicious with tea. Pineapple enhances tea to the extent that in many homes, slices of Hawaiian pineapple are served in the tea instead of the heretofore popular lemon. And with dainty pastry the pineapple presents a pleasing combination.

As for marmalade—second cousin to muffins and tea—pineapple marmalade is one of the simplest to make and so delicious in flavor that it should be well represented on the shelf of every home where tea is a happy function.

Many of the cakes and tarts that make up the tea refreshments, may be made in advance. If there is a baking day in the home—a survival of the old established custom of Saturday baking for the week's needs—then that is an excellent time to bake a host of attractive cookies and tarts and pastry which will last for the week. They can be put away in a tightly closed tin box, and tea for the family and intimate circle of friends who "just drop in" will mean only putting the kettle on.

However, if the tea is to be a large affair, one of those delightfully "informal formal" teas, when a larger circle of friends are invited in, but the atmosphere is kept just as informal and casual as possible, then there may be along with the sandwiches and cakes more elaborate pastries such as cream puffs or fruit tarts.

Pineapple Tea Muffins are made by creaming one-fourth cup shortening with one-fourth cup sugar. Beat one egg and add one cup milk. Sift two and one-half cups flour, four teaspoons baking powder, one teaspoon salt and add alternately with the egg and one buffet size can drained crushed Hawaiian pineapple. Bake in well-greased muffin tins in hot oven (400 degrees F) twenty to twenty-five minutes.

Paradise Marmalade is made in this way: Wash three oranges and one lemon and slice very thin; add one medium size can crushed Hawaiian pineapple and five cups water. Cover and allow to stand overnight. Cook for two hours. Add two cups sugar and cook very slowly one hour longer. The slow cooking will give the marmalade a rich amber color. Pour into sterilized glasses and seal with paraffin.

Waikiki Fruit Tarts are a combination of crispy pastry and creamy filling. Line a deep pie dish with either puff or short pastry and bake a delicate yellow. A half hour before serving, fill with contents of large can of sliced Hawaiian pineapple. Pour over a thick boiled custard seasoned delicately with vanilla and place where it will chill. A meringue can be placed on top, or pastry stars. These make a decorative and dainty finish.

Pineapple Cream Puffs have just enough of the tart taste of the pineapple to make cream puffs admissible for tea. Melt one-fourth cup butter or other fat and add one-half cup boiling water. As soon as the boiling point is reached, add one-half cup flour all at once and stir vigorously until well mixed. Remove from the fire and add two unbeaten eggs, one at a time, beating until thoroughly mixed between each addition. Drop by spoonfuls on a greased pan at least one and one-half inches apart. Bake thirty minutes in a moderate oven. With a sharp knife make a cut in the side through which to fill puff. Heat the contents of a buffet size can of crushed Hawaiian pineapple. Mix one-half cup of sugar, three tablespoons flour and one-fourth cup cold water and add hot pineapple, stirring constantly. Cook ten minutes in a double boiler, add one tablespoon lemon juice, cool and put in cakes.

Some Questions Answered

As before mentioned in our pages Rev. Elvin Magary of Wood ward Avenue Presbyterian church of Detroit, conducts a "question box" each Sabbath after the regular services and before a large class he answers many inquiries sent to him on spiritual and social matters Among others which were passed upon last Sunday we note the following:

Question—"In your opinion is it a sin to obtain a divorce and remarry?" Answer—"I do not think all who obtain a divorce and re marry ought to be criticised. There are other sins fully as bad as this and if a couple are living in continual strife and bickering and no possibility of mending matters because they are unsuited to each other, then it is better that they separate, but those who separate solely for the purpose of making other alliances or for reasons of physical convenience are generally classed as adulterers. The trend of the times is to live much different than years ago, and after a couple have been together for a few years and have children they usually learn to overlook each others faults to some extent. I do not believe all divorces are deserving of severe criticism."

Question—"Do you think that Hell is really a place prepared for the sinner or is it merely a condition of mind brought about by con science." Answer—"The facts are most of the ministers of modern times are inclined to lay aside the old-time belief of hell-fire and brim stone. Most of us are constantly being tested and no doubt in this process the human mind is quite apt to consider the crosses and denials as more than it can bear. To such persons this is hell itself, but the Master constantly tests his fol lowers as in the days of the gold rush to California my father picked up an unusually fine rich-looking piece of ore and took it to the essayer to find its real value. The essayer put it through various tests by means of chemicals and heat and found the pure gold withstood the test but the rock and dross dis appeared under the pressure of heat and chemicals. Likewise many christians are tested by God to determine their state of spirituality and no doubt many of them consider this a veritable punishment."

Question—"Is it right in your opinion to turn down a teacher of mature years and judgment, of Christian principles because he or she happens to be 40 years of age, and hire a younger unexperienced person in the day schools?" Answer—"I do not know that the Detroit School Boards are discrim inating on the age limits of school teachers and with the exception of one or two instances this has not been done that I know of. Where it was done there were other extremely good reasons beside the age limit and I do not believe it is a practice with the boards. As for me I would much rather my children would be taught by on older more sensible woman with children of her own and who knows and fears the results of social life than a young person or a girl who is merely filling in the time trying to teach school while she is waiting for some acceptable suitor to come along and who is frivolous to a high degree. I do not believe that a lady who has taught until she married and has retired for four or five years then through force of cir cumstances is again compelled to enter the profession is capable of doing so unless she takes a preparatory course to bring her up-to date. In these days of wonderful changes in the science of pedagogy and in all lines of intellectual de velopment, a teacher who has been out of the profession for a short time only, needs preparation."

These questions and many more the Rev. Magary passed upon and regretted having so little time for consideration of many more which came before the class. He has so many more than he can handle con stantly piling up that it is becoming a problem. He says he has received many letters asking if contributions to the broadcasting fund would be desirable and he replies "It certainly would." At this stage of the game three or four men of the church are paying the expense of the radio and saying nothing but it is a heavy burden. Perhaps most of our listeners do not realize that it costs $2.00 per minute to broadcast over WJR. That is the figure and in one year you can easily see the bill is enormous. If you appreciate our "Question Box" and any other of our services we shall be more than glad to recieve your contribution toward the fund. Nothing is too small. We thank you."

In the above remarks we may not have used the exact words of Rev. Magary but we hope the sentiment is correctly quoted.

Rev. H. H. Savage of the Pontiac Baptist church stated last Sun day morning that as an advertising proposition broadcasting certainly brings results. He says there are on his desk now 300 unanswered letters from listeners throughout southern Michigan and northern Indiana. Illinois, Ohio and southern Canada. His dates are constantly piling up for outside speak ing and every evening of the week is taken up. Last Sunday at his church there were 119 attendants from twenty or more miles away, and one person came from a small village in Ohio much farther away. We do not believe the broadcasting of church services is helping the small churches scattered thruout the country to any extent, although we scarcely believe anyone will remain away from their own local church on this account. At least we hope this is not done.

ONE reason why there is no reason to worry greatly about motor fuel for a long time ahead is that people are worrying about it. Interest in such a question at the right time, is the best insurance against disaster. The President and the Federal Oil Corporation Board have done what was needed, at the right time.

We know that most petroleum has come from rather limited areas and that even from these only a small proportion has been taken out. Oil produced by gas pressure capable of lifting it to the surface when we drill holes is but a small proportion of all the oil contained in the sands. Even from the best pools recovery by the old methods is small, perhaps one-half in the most favorable conditions, oftener one-sixth, or one-seventh, or one-tenth. But a considerable part of what still remains in the ground can be recovered by methods now established as technically and economically practicable.

Producing oil from coal and shales and by mining the oil bearing sands is entirely possible. Experiments are going on in these directions, and if we ever have to fall back on these resources we will be ready. For a long time, however, the present methods of exploration and drilling, with improving processes to assure larger recoveries, are likely to suffice.

An Oil Dome Illustrated

I am no draughtsman, but maybe I can draw something that will help explain. Here's a rough drawing of an oil dome. The shaded part at the bottom is a deposit of oil bearing sands—with an impervious rock stratum above. A wild-catter drilled the hole A-B and gas pressure caused oil and gas to flow. After a while the gas pressure wasn't sufficient to keep up the flow and they pumped until ultimately even this ceased producing.

Nevertheless, most of the oil was still left sticking to the sand grains. Then the operator drilled the well C-D, which flowed for a time, but most of the oil was still down there in the sand. If the gas pressure could be restored more would flow. So the operator injects gas into one well, restoring the pressure and causing the oil to resume flowing from the other. After a time the flow will stop again, but still much of the oil will be left. In some fields it has been possible to obtain additional amounts of oil by introducing water in some of the wells and forcing the oil to others. The addition of a chemical such as soda ash to the water may assist in removing the oil from the sand grains, but neither plain water nor water containing chemicals should be introduced into an oil sand except as a last resort; for it is likely that the water, which travels faster through the sand, will get to the open wells ahead of the oil and when the flow is resumed under pressure water will come out.

Everything Saved Nowadays

The gas escaping from an oil well carries with it a proportion of gasoline, which in the old days was lost. Nowadays it is extracted from the gas and saved, while the dry gas can be forced back into the ground to maintain pressure.

One of the menaces to most oil pools is the inflow of subterranean water. Water flows through the oil sands faster than oil, and by surrounding the bottom of the well keeps the oil out. How to shut off the water and permit the oil to run out is a problem with which the engineers have long worked. They have made great progress and so increased recoveries.

In earlier times most oil producers carefully guarded all information about their wells and experiences, but latterly there is co-operation in these matters. Geologists and petroleum engineers, once derided by the "practical" oil men, are more and more accepted as guides and mentors. New knowledge is constantly increasing recoveries.

As to Mining for Oil

In Lorraine they have dug shafts down to the oil sands and actually brought the sands out, like coal from a mine. But it's costly.

Another mining process is to sink a shaft to the oil sands and from its bottom drive tunnels in all directions through the sands. From these tunnels small perforated pipes are driven into the sands, which drain the oil out of the sands. It flows to larger pipes back at the foot of the shaft and thence is pumped out. This requires installing an expensive plant, but in some fields the high recovery that is assured might justify the cost. I understand the process is about to be intsalled in a few fields in this country, some companies being convinced it is practicable and profitable.

Oil can be distilled from coal, and much work is now being done along this line. But more appeal has been made by the plan of extracting oil from shale. The shales of Scotland have been worked for three-quarters of a century, and they are almost unlimited in this country, richer in oil than those of Scotland. Kentucky, Ohio, Colorado, Utah, Nevada, Wyoming and California are particularly rich in shales. It is just a question of the cost of extracting the oil. Congress has given $180,000, with which the Bureau has installed a plant near Rulison, Colorado, to distill oil from the Colorado River Shales. It is calculated that the shales mined at Rulison will produce about a barrel of oil to the ton.

The Use of Oil Shales

In Scotland they are working shales that produce about twenty-five gallons of oil per ton. The seams are from three-and-a-half to eight or ten feet thick. In Colorado are seams many times as thick and containing much more oil per ton. Reduction of shales involves an enormous mining operation, and after the oil is extracted the vast tonnage of refuse must be disposed of. So it is expensive compared with producing oil from wells.

Ben E. Lindsey of the Bureau of Mines Experiment Station at Bartlesville, Okla., is confident that exploration, better recoveries, better utilization and deeper drilling would furnish enough oil to meet all requirements for at least twenty-five to fifty years, if it could be extracted in that time. But as a practical matter this will not be possible. Within that period there will be times of shortage, when oil from shales will be needed to supplement the oil from wells, etc.

SKI FANS "FALL" 95 MILES HOUR

Jump from a 12-story building and if, in some mysterious manner, you remain alive you then will have some idea of the thrill of the ski jumper who hurtles through the air at 95 miles an hour and, usually, lands on his feet, safely.

"Dive from the Brooklyn Bridge and you'll get the same swish of rushing air," advises one of the now numerous ski enthusiasts. "Or, better still, get a pair of skiis and come on out!"

Today dozens of Detroit enthusiasts use the great slide at Rochester, and many of them make jumps of more than 150 feet. Some will go beyond the 200-foot mark, but all will enjoy the thrill of being for a brief moment the fastest moving human being in the world.

Henry Hall, of Detroit, the man who in 1921 amazed the ski jumping world with his leap of 229 feet, declares that he can't actually describe the feeling of dropping through space with gravity as one's motive power.

"You take off," he said. "Then instantly there is a rush of air and suddenly you feel the sensation of dropping. The earth rushes up to meet you and then you are sliding down hill again. The thrill of the thing can't be described!"

The world champion is one of six brothers, all of Detroit and all ski jumpers with reputations.

"My father determined that we would all learn to ski," declared Henry, the oldest. "When each of us was old enough to wear skis, he was taken out by my father near our home in Ishpeming, Mich., and given his first lessons. Next he taught us all to jump and deliberately trained us for the big events. He determined to popularize the sport in America."

Mrs. Hall, mother of the six boys, is not so enthusiastic about the great jumps. She worries about her boys and will never attend the big meets because she fears disastrous results. Her contribution to the fame of the family is providing the warm clothing necessary for the frigid weather conditions her sons must meet.

The father of the six Halls is recognized as the founder of skiing in Michigan. Shortly after the first ski tournament ever held in America, in 1893, he began planning the careers for his sons.

When Harold Smith in 1909 made a jump of 148 feet during a meet held at Davos, Switzerland, the world gasped and believed the record would stand forever.

In fact, it did stand for more than eight years, when the product of a father's training in the person of Henry Hall came into the public eye. In 1917 at Steamboat Springs, Col., the Detroit athlete made a new world's record. He cleared the snow for a distance of 203 feet. Four years later he again startled the world, when he bettered his own distance by 26 feet.

Curious as to the speed he attains on his great jumps, several times Henry has attempted to have himself timed. Once he got a definite figure of one and three-fourths seconds for a jump of 160 feet. His 200-foot jumps, however, have not been recorded. The estimate of 95 miles an hour is an average speed throughout the entire jump, including the comparatively slow rate of speed immediately after the takeoff and the tremendous rush of human bones and muscle during that tense fraction of a second before he hits the ground.

IDLE FACTORIES SWELL ARMY OF SPORTSMEN

Employment conditions in Michigan have an important bearing on hunting and fishing and conservation in general.

When industrial conditions are unfavorable and hundreds are out of employment temporarily a great portion of them turn their attention to hunting and fishing. This is especially true in Western and Northern Michigan, favorite hunting and fishing grounds of the state.

With men flocking to the cities from the farms the industrial conditions play a greater factor in conservation matters yearly. The more men flocking to the cities, the more hunters, fishers and trappers during the slack periods in the automobile and other industries.

Closing of shops in cities increases many times the number of hunters and fishermen.

WORK ON GRAND HAVEN'S FILTER TO BEGIN IN SPRING

Contract for designing and drawing plans for the new filtration plant which will be erected by the city of Grand Haven has been awarded to a Chicago firm and work on the plant will be started next spring, it is announced by City Manager Paul R. Taylor.

Actual construction will be started late in April or early in May.

BLIND TAUGHT BY BLIND TEACHER IN DETROIT'S SCHOOLS

This thing of going to and from work through the congested area of the city, is hard enough for the person with none of his senses impaired. But Miss Marie Sprengel of Detroit accomplishes this feat every day despite the fact she is blind, depending only on her hearing, a familiarity with streets and safety zones and considerable confidence in her fellow citizens.

Her problem is rather complicated for the reason that she lives on the east side while she teaches on the west side of Detroit. In addition, she must travel unassisted to three other schools in widely separated sections of the city every week.

Miss Sprengel, who received her education in the Michigan State School for the Blind at Lansing, has been teaching in the Detroit public schools four years. At the present time she is one of the teachers of the blind in the Franklin School, where she teaches lower grade pupils all "home room" subjects such as reading, writing, typewriting and arithmetic.

Primarily, she is a teacher of music, giving instruction in this subject at the Franklin and also at the three other public schools which conduct centers for blind children.

DAUGHTER LOST TO DETROIT MAN

In the days of King Solomon, two women claimed a child. The king scanned the evidence and found therein nothing that would guide him to a decision.

Two men claimed little Margaret Anne Luce, 5 years old, blue-eyed, full of life and happy. One was her real father, Ernest Luce, an automobile worker of Detroit; the other, her foster father, John McCormick, a Broadway attorney, whose home is in Brooklyn. The father set forth that he had brought little Margaret Anne into the world; the foster father showed that little Margaret Anne had been born in his home; that he had cared for her and loved her all of her life.

Justice James Dunne, of the Brooklyn Supreme Court, after considering the case for more than two weeks, finally reached a decision, not as King Solomon did, that the child should be severed in twain and half awarded to each claimant, but that little Margaret Anne should go to her foster father rather than to her real father, a decision contrary to natural law, yet highly pleasing to Margaret Anne and to John McCormick.

In his decision, Justice Dunne wrote that Mr. McCormick had set forth that the child's mother on her death bed has "earnestly asked the deponent to take care of the child," and that she had made a will in which she nominate Mr. McCormick as her general guardian.

"Now after the lapse of a long period during which time the guardian has faithfully and carefully fulfilled the trust and zealously regarded the confidence imposed in him, petitioner suddenly appears from a distant state and demands custody of the child. Although it may well be a tenent of natural law that to a parent belongs the paramount right to the possession of its offspring, nevertheless, under the refinements of our modern civilization such paramount right is not a vested one and must recede and even become forfeit where it conflicts with the best interests of the child whose custody is sought."

MOOSE HUNTING IS HARD ON LAWYER

William J. Branstrom, Fremont attorney, Newaygo County, in hunting moose near the Bruce Mines and Moose River, Canada, last fall, experienced such physical exertion following a guide through deep snow 25 to 30 miles a day that on his return he urged physical training for any one contemplating starting out on such a trip.

"My suggestion," said Mr. Branstrom, "is to prepare yourself physically before starting out on an actual hunt. If you don't there will be a loss of several days on the moose grounds. This will be due to the extreme lameness caused by the suddent exertion of muscles seldom used. Walking several miles a day beforehand is, in my estimation, the thing to do. "It is hazardous to drive an automobile at night through regions where moose abound," said Mr. Branstrom. "The guide told me of a tourist party driving in darkness through the country in which I hunted. A 1,700-pound bull moose, infuriated by the bright glow of the deadlights, charged the car, killing itself, wrecking the car and slightly injuring several of the occupants. Tourists are warned by the government wardens to use precaution while traveling at night."

Faith and Firm Purpose Create Women's Club Home

A new era has dawned for the woman who visits Los Angeles. Once she had to go to a hotel. Now she can go to her hotel. For by skill, energy and perseverance a group of Los Angeles women alone have put up a new million and a quarter dollar structure devoted to women and to their families—including men.

It is more like a giant hospitable club than a hotel. The women have a plunge and a gymnasium at their disposal. If they wish to play golf the hotel will give them courtesy cards to their choice among the many famous Los Angeles all grass golf courses.

More than a score of years ago some women in Los Angeles were given a modest piece of land on Figueroa street. It was then so far out in the country that orange orchards were very close to it. It was then that women with high faith and firm purpose resolved to convert that land into a treasure. They held to it. They guarded it against unwise building. They woke up almost literally one morning to find that their dream of a hotel was within reach. The growth of the city had surrounded the land with large buildings. Its value leaped skyward. It went so far skyward that the value of the land plus the value of the intended building permitted the women to sell bonds in the sum of three-quarters of a million dollars. With this and other money accumulated they put up a twelve story class A building and adorned it with a delicacy of taste that has made it generally admired.

Mrs. Chester C. Ashley, shown in full face in the picture is the moving spirit of the Hotel. She is chairman of the Building Committee. Mrs. Maude N. Bouldin, shown in profile, is managing director.

The profits of the Figueroa hotel are to be used in the creation of a new building fund. When it is of sufficient size it will be employed in the erection of a new hotel for employed women.

LUMBER SHIP HAS BATTLE WITH ICE

Navigation closed on Lake Huron for the season of 1926 when the steam barge Langell Boys and the schooner C. J. Fillmore, lumber laden from Blind River, Ont., docked after taking 47 days to make a journey which is ordinarily made in a tenth of that time. They left Blind River Nov. 30 and reached Saginaw Bay Dec. 6.

After spending some days in ineffectual bucking of ice encountered when they entered the bay, a wrecking tug, the Sarnia City, was sent to assist the Langell Boys and her barge and the steam barge Charles H. Bradley, which was also headed for Bay City. The tug early released the Bradley from a big ice floe and the ship made port at Alpena, where it went into winter quarters.

The Langell Boys, however, couldn't be released, and besides, the ship and the barge were loaded with lumber destined for Bay City. The barge and the tug bucked ice until coal gave out. Little headway had been made. Sometimes they would gain a few miles, then a southerly wind would drive the big ice floe toward the mouth of the bay, and they would lose in a few hours the gains it had taken days to make.

With coal gone the vessels began to use their lumber cargo for fuel, and 60,000 feet or more were burned.

In the meantime, provisions ran low and finally a few members of the crew managed to make their way to Bay City, braving the danger of open water, to arrange for the delivery of food and fuel. Trucks were sent out with coal, but the first deliveries were at the cost of $25 a ton. One car that carried food, broke through thin ice on the way back and went to the bottom.

Finally the ice became so thick that the ship officers abandoned all efforts to force a way through. They decided to cut a channel 25 miles to the docks at Bay City.

Power ice saws were rigged up, with gasoline motors and mounted on sleds and the cutting of the channel started. A crew of four men pulled each sled along the channel and the saws bit into the ice, often 24 to 28 inches thick.

PROTECTING LAST GIANT OF FOREST WALTON'S AIM

The Izaak Walton League is sponsoring a movement to have designated as a state park an area around the largest tree in Michigan. This forest giant is standing in Missaukee County, on the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 30, township 24 north of range 6 west.

The tree is a cork pine and at one time was part of a vast forest belonging to Gilbert Ruggles, of Manistee, who resisted all offers of lumbermen to purchase it. The tree is about 160 feet high and it is estimated it would cut 7,000 feet of 4-inch plank and common lumber.

George Doxie estimated the tree is about 700 years old. Mr. Doxie is a pioneer timber cruiser, who has resided in the section since 1865.

WHAT TO EAT FOR HEALTH STUDIED

By advising consumers what to eat to obtain good health and prolong life, Michigan State College believes it also can render a valuable economic service to farmers.

With this aim in view the college has started a series of experiments to determine the value of various vegetables in terms of health. This work is in charge of Dr. John W. Crist, vegetable specialist.

"The consumer of food is more anxious than ever before to have a diet which will give him the most in terms of health and years of life," says Dr. Crist.

"This is particularly true of parents and others charged with the care of children. They desire to promote the physical well being of their dependents. That the public is sincere in its hope to obtain foods that promote body growth and vigor is evidenced by the unprecedented demand for certain commodities that are not very palatable or good to the taste, yet are essential to the human body.

"Cod liver oil and raw yeast are examples. No longer are mere appearance, tenderness and palatability the sole elements to guide consumers in the purchase of food. They are interested in the vitamin content.

"The place of fresh vegetables in a diet is well established, yet fresh vegetables are not all the same in their value as foods or in their action on the body. Their vitamin content varies. It is time to distinguish between the different vegetables and that is the purpose of thes experiments."

The college has completed its test with lettuce, finding leaf lettuce is richer in vitamin than head lettuce. It next will test celery, asparagus, cabbage and other vegetables.

LATER TOMATOES WIN AS MAKERS OF PROFIT

A stunted tomato plant may produce more tomatoes in the season than one that has not been retarded but it will not return the grower as much profit as a plant which is forced to early maturity, Dr. John W. Crist, greenhouse specialist at Michigan State College, has found in a recent experiment.

Two lots of tomato plants of the same variety were tested. One batch of seed was planted Nov. 5, and the growth of the plants was retarded in the greenhouses until transplanted to the permanent beds on March 19. The rest of the seeds were planted Jan. 20 and the growth of the plants was never retarded. These were transplanted to permanent beds on March 20.

The first ripe tomatoes were picked from the plants started Nov. 5, yet the returns from the first five pickings from the plants started Jan. 20 were about double the yield from the early plants. This fruit was produced at a time when tomatoes were selling at $3 a basket.

GAS TAX REVENUE EXCEEDS ESTIMATE OF STATE MILLIONS

Receipts from the gasoline tax for 1926 ran more than $1,000,000 above the estimate, it was reported by Burton F. Browne, director of the gas tax division of the secretary of state's office.

The total for the year was $10 700,455.07, Mr. Browne declared. Estimates early in the year placed the probable receipts at $9,500,000. December receipts in 1926 exceeded those for the same month in 1925 by more than $50,000. The figure for December, 1926, was $735,497.31.

SPEED GRADING FAILS TO AID CONSUMER IS PLAINT

Michigan consumers, except the million or so in Detroit, are not benefitting from the potato grading law to the same extent as consumers in terminal markets in nearby states into which Michigan spuds are shipped, in the opinion of Grand Rapids residents.

A large part of the potatoes sold in home markets, such as Grand Rapids, are trucked in by farmers or truckers, and consumers complain these tubers are not as well graded as those shipped in carlots to Detroit and to out-of-state markets. In fact, it is charged, most of the truck potatoes are ungraded.

The State has inspectors in the field to check the grade of potatoes shipped in cars, but the inspection force is too small to look after all truckloads. Also, farmers are exempt from the provisions of the grading law, making it difficult to determine whether the potatoes are offered by growers or truckers.

TRADE SWINGS TO PROSPERITY ERA

Detroit's industrial pendulum is once again on the upward swing and a great movement of incoming freight to supply the demand of local manufacturers for raw material is taking place through the Toledo gateway, reports of various traffic experts indicate.

These reports show that many large manufacturing plants whcih experienced the normal lull of the holiday season already have resumed high-pressure operations and that others rapidly are hitting toward peak production.

All of which mean employment for thousands of men, thus stimulating buying power and firmly establishing the condition of prosperity economic experts had predicted would be Detroit's portion early in 1927.

To meet increasing demands in the hauling of Detroit-bound freight—coal, steel and other raw material—railways serving this area have added to their facilities at various points at which this freight is handled.

Roberta Risks It

BY MARGARET CAMERON

MARGARET CAMERON LEWIS

CHAPTER FORTY-SEVEN

Roberta, half penitent and wholly impatient over what she conceived to be a tempest in a teapot, watched his departure from an upper window, more puzzled than ever and again somewhat frightened. Even through the dusk his face had looked set and white.

"Where's Peter gone, Janet?" she asked, with an assumption of carelessness.

"He said he waur gaein' tae the deil."

"Oh, la, la!" murmured Roberta. How idiotic men were! She wondered uneasily whether he intended to get drunk.

Piggy's intention was no more than to dine in solitude at Keene, but there he met Jim Cody enjoying an evening off duty, and Ossa piled itself upon Pelion.

Some time after dinner, when Piggy had not returned, Roberta's uneasiness got the better of her pride and she tapped at Janet's door.

"May I come in a minute? I want to talk to you." She perched on the bed, waving the old woman back to the chair. "I—I'm worried about Peter. Why does he go into a rage like that about his name?"

"His name?" Janet, who had other anxieties, looked surprised.

"That's the reason he's gone off in a huff tonight. I teased him about it, and—we had a terrible quarrel."

"He shouldn't be angry about that, since he told ye himself."

"He didn't," Roberta confessed. "He wouldn't tell me, and that made me curious, so I got it out of you." Then, when the Scotswoman's face grew grim, she hastily explained: "I mean—oh, I don't mean that I deliberately laid a trap for you! It was a sort of accident. You see, we'd had a—a joke, he and I, about Galahad, and when I said last night that he was like Galahad, you said you didn't think he'd tell me that, because he'd always been ashamed of his name. Then I knew that must be part of it—and I let you tell me the rest. I didn't think it really mattered. How could it? I thought he was just a little sensitive about it, and I—I wanted to tease him—so I did. It made him perfectly furious. He was as white as death and—oh, awful!"

Worn by long strain, Roberta's nerves failed her and she sobbed out the rest of the story, tears running in rivulets down her distorted face. "He said I had no sense of honor and that he didn't like girls. He said he'd never had anything to do with one before and never would again. That made me angry, so I said things, too—and then he rushed off—and he hasn't been in the house since. I didn't mean to hurt, Janet! I wouldn't have hurt him for anything in the world! He's been so wonderful to us—so splendid! But that's what's been the matter with him all day, and I'm so worried! I'm afraid—"

"What is it ye fear, lass?"

"He looked so—so beside himself when he went off in the car, and he told you he was going to the devil. He might get drunk."

"Not the lad. He's no drinker."

"I'm so sorry!" Roberta sobbed. "I didn't think he'd take it that way—just a silly name!"

"Nor did he," said Janet soothingly. "He may ha' been angry. Since he was a wee lad he's hated his name an' kept it secret, an' ye shouldna ha' tormented him about it. It wasna kind. But like enough he's forgot it now. The lad has real trouble."

"Trouble? What's happened?" Janet shook her head. "Are we in danger? Has my father—" Again the shaken head. "But it's something about us, isn't it? Celia and me?" Unable to deny this, the old woman kept her lips closed. "Janet, tell me!"

"No. I'll no be tellin' the lad's secrets again."

"Is it a secret? Did you promise not to tell me? Did you?"

"He wouldna like it."

"But we're partners, Janet, and if he's in trouble it's my trouble, too. And if it's because of what he's done for us— You must tell me!"

Touched, deep under her stern crust, by this solicitude for the lad she loved, and deciding that soon the truth must be known of all men—and women, Janet told.

Horror dried the last of Roberta's tears. Keenly she questioned, until every detail known to Janet, with the single exception of her probable loss of pension, had been drawn out. Pallid, with right-clasped hands, the girl said at last:

"You're sure Mr. Brazenose meant it? Sure he won't relent?"

"He'll not relent. Next to the lad—sometimes I think before him—the Business is the apple o' his eye. He's a guid man, an' just i' the main—but he'll not forgive this."

"Perhaps Peter has followed him—driven to Boston, to tell him before it's too late that he'll go home and—and be good."

Janet arose, steely light in her eye. "The lad? Dy'e ken him so little, then, that ye think he'll break his word?"

"But he ought to break it now, Janet!"

"He'll no."

"Oh, why didn't he tell me! I'd have made him go. I could manage somehow. He mustn't break with his father, Janet! He loves him so!"

"Aye, they love each other. But they're alike. They'll not give in."

"Then where has Peter gone? What's he doing?"

"That I canna tell ye. But he'll come back."

Peter at that moment, was talking to Jim Cody, with whom he had dined, reluctantly, at the hotel. He was in no mood for playing the part he had assigned himself, but Cody was insistent, having found a presumably sympathetic ear into which to pour all the trials, observations, wit, and wise conclusions of a chauffeur touching at its outer edges the family mystery of his employer. He began at once:

"Gawd, it's good to get away from Birchwood! The old man's got an edge on him like a rip saw. Say, ain't it the limit the way that girl faded out o' sight?"

"Aw, forget it," said Peter Brown wearily. "I'm fed up with that stuff."

"But where d'you 'spose she went to?"

"Search me. Forget it, I tell you. I'm sick an' tired o' the whole business."

The sharpness of the tone brought Cody out of his absorption in the Scott problem and the opinions he wished to impart, and for the first time he looked at the other attentively.

"Say, what's the matter with you? You're white's a ghost. Sick?"

"I gotta nawful headache." Piggy truthfully returned. "Whadda you know about this new tire they're putting out?"

Thereafter the conversation was technical, enlivened by argument and illustrative anecdote, until the subject of engines was introduced, applying a match to Cody's tow.

"That there Nixon guy makes an engine. Ever see one of 'em?"

"Uhhuh."

"Any good?"

"Naw, they're bum." Piggy hastily dilated upon the merits of an engine meeting his approval, but his words fell upon inattentive ears. Cody was chuckling.

"Nixon's in bad with the old man. D'you think he helped her get away?"

CHAPTER FORTY-EIGHT

"Give it up," said Piggy in answer to Cody's query, "now this new—"

But Scott's chauffeur was not to be diverted by mere commonplaces of mechanics. "His not phonin' to any place north that night looks kind o' funny. An' if the other girl's here, as they say, maybe he is in it. He's gone on her, so maybe all this talk o' his about tryin' to find 'em is bluff. The old man thinks it is, an' he's gettin' hotter an' hotter. If Nixon does know where Celia is, he'd better come across with her in a hurry if he wants to save his skin."

"Why? Scott can't do anything to him except cuss him, unless it's proved he took the girl."

"Oh, can't he! You don't know the old man. If Nixon can't prove he didn't have nothin' to do with it, he'll think a elephant's stepped on him. There won't be enough left of him to pick up."

"What do you mean?" At last Peter Brown was listening. "How?"

Cody glanced about cautiously and lowered his voice. "Well, I ain't supposed to know nothin' about it, but I hear 'em talkin' in the car. I'd lose my job if it got out, though."

Piggy nodded. "Sure. I know. I won't tell."

"Well, the old man owns a lot o' stock in Nixon's concern. I guess Nixon didn't know that himself 'til just lately, by the way he talks, an' he don't like it a little bit. It seems the other girl, Roberta—the one that fought with the old man an' got throwed out—come back from Yurrop the other day to marry this here Nixon guy, but nobody knows that outside o' Nixon an' the family. The old man found out she was comin', an' fixed up some scheme so Nixon couldn't meet her like he said he would. It didn't make him any sweeter when Nixon told him none o' this wouldda happened if he'd kept hands off, either.

Anyhow, he put a detective onto this other girl, but she give him the slip somehow, an' they think she's got Celia, an' maybe Nixon was helpin' 'em when them dogs got after him. He swears he ain't seen her an' dunno where she's at. That's the reason they got after you folks. Nixon saw Mis' Smith some'rs an' said she looked like Roberta. She is about the same size. But he's sure in bad. Maybe he kids himself the old man'll wait to be sure, but he ain't the waitin' kind. He's gettin' good an' ready to smash sump'n, an' it'll be Nixon if he don't find the girl quick. 'Twouldn't surprise me none to have him wipe out that guy any minute."

"But—good Lord!" said Piggy, blankly. "If Nixon didn't do it—"

"Somebody did it, an' it looks like maybe he was in on it. Anyhow, the old man's after his scalp."

"Besides—" Piggy was thinking fast and desperately—"if Scott's got a lot o' money tied up in Nixon's concern, he ain't goin' to lose it."

"Aw, what's that to him? He's got money to burn—an' you bet he'll burn it, if he once gets started! It won't be the first time he's done that to get even with somebody. He'll cook Nixon to a crisp over the fire it makes, too. When he's mad, he don't stop for money nor nothin' else. All he cares about is smashin' the other feller flat, an' you bet he does it!"

Ossa on Pelion! Piggy tried to get away then, but, having found that sympathetic ear for which he had longed, Cody clung to it, insisting upon emptying his mind into that of an auditor of his own caste, whom he trusted. So the other, perforce, listened to all that had happened, might have happened, or presumably would happen in connection with the Scott mystery. Then, the pressure within him somewhat reduced, Cody asked, with a grin:

"Say, what's this I hear one o' them newspaper guys tellin' about your hair bein' dyed? What's the idear?"

Once more Piggy explained the idea, and his friend laughed.

"Say, aint it the limit what notions women take? I worked for one once that made me wear white uniforms in summer. White—in a car! Can you beat it? Gawd, it musta cost her more'n she paid me to get 'em cleaned, an' every time I got a smear on one she took it out o' my hide, besides. It was my first job drivin', but you betcher life I quit her cold first chance I got. Say, Pete, you look sick. Ain't your head no better? C'mon over to the drug store an' get a bromo seltzer."

"No; I'll go home."

"You look like you couldn't drive that far. You swaller a bromo seltzer first."

Piggy, following the line of least resistance, swallowed one and escaped, stunned by the knowledge that Nixon was in Scott's power.

Never having suffered the pangs of disappointed love himself his sympathies had not been aroused on that count, and to let the despised Whangdoodle take the consequences of being at once a quitter and a snooper had seemed to partake of poetic justice. But to remain aloof while another man—even that same Whangdoodle—paid a heavy price for a deed committed by one Percival Galahad Brazenose was unthinkable. Something must be done about it—immediately. But he could not act without first consulting Bob.

Bob! Lost to him. A dispelled illusion. Just one of an innumerable number of girls, all essentially alike. Dad lost, too—justly enough, he decided bitterly. His inheritance gone, his future blank, Janet's old age stripped of comfort through his folly, Celia and her sister dependent upon him for safety—and now Nixon to be exonerated. Like most energetic, cheerful persons, when Piggy yielded to depression he did it thoroughly. His spirits struck rock bottom and stayed there during the long drive to Fitzwilliam.

The late and waning moon was peeping over the hills when he drove down the lane and into the barn, still shadowed by the man on the motorcycle. Janet heard him, and went downstairs to meet him at the kitchen door with a candle.

"Ye're late, lad," she whispered. "Ha, ye had yer dinner?"

"Yes. Where's Bob? I've got to see her."

"She's been in bed this long while, though I heard her stirrin' a bit ago. Ye look worn out, laddie. Shall I make ye some coffee?"

"No, thanks. I don't want anything. But I've got to see Bob right away."

"Wait, lad. It's late, an' the poor lassie's tired, too. Ye'll not be wakin' her."

"She may not be asleep. I'll see."

His light tap on Roberta's door brought no response, and a soft call of "Bob, are you awake?" was unanswered. So he went to his own room, and for the first time in his life lay sleepless through the night, turning over in his mind plans for freeing Nixon from suspicion, without dsclosing his own identity, for his father's sake, or failing in his obligation to the girls. Toward dawn he found a possible solution.

If Roberta would consent to take Celia back to Birchwood and tell her father the whole story, without using the Brazenose name. Nixon's innocence would be proved. The mere threat of the simple legal expedient suggested by his own father should bring Scott to time; even he would hardly risk having a family scandal dragged into the courts. Janet could truthfully say that she had been employed by a woman calling herself Mrs. Smith, refusing to divulge her deeper knowledge. He would disappear—alone, he could elude the detectives—and find a job in the far West, or in South America. He wanted to put the greatest possible distance between himself and dad now.

This plan spelled failure for him, but it ought to turn the trick, and he could see no other way of keeping faith with everybody concerned. If Roberta would consent— But would she? And could the girls be depended upon to keep the secret of his name? Not for his own sake, but for dad's.

CHAPTER FORTY-NINE

In the morning he was down early, chafing because Roberta was late. At last he sent Janet up to summon her, and a moment afterward took the stairs three at a time himself.

Roberta's room was empty. The bed had not been slept in. The black gown and coat and veiled widow's bonnet he had bought for her hung in the closet; beneath them the little black shoes neatly side by side. In the brown clothing she had worn when she arrived in New York, Roberta had gone—but where? How? Why?

Vainly they searched for a note of explanation, vainly plied the startled and hysterical Celia for a clue. Neither explanation nor clue was forthcoming. Roberta had vanished. A sinister modern phrase, "spurlos versankt," had not then come into common circulation, but the condition it describes prevailed. Without the intervention of cats or bonfire, the elder sister had disappeared as completely from the Fitzwilliam house as had the younger from Birchwood, and Birchwood itself was not more bewildered than was Percival Galahad Brazenose, nor the Whangdoodle more forlorn.

Seeking a motive for her flight, he could find none except his own hot words the day before, and this added one more weight to the mass holding him submerged on rock bottom while the flood of misery rolled over and around him. Bob, proud, high-spirited little Bob, resentful of his unreasoning outburst—and rightly, for he had classed her with other girls, and there was not, never had been, and never could be another like her—Oh, he knew that now!—had fled, unwilling to continue another day under the same roof with him or to put herself further in his debt. She had threatened to go to Nixon.

Pale visaged, lips compressed and teeth set, Piggy faced the truth. He loved her. He wanted her. In the days they had spent together she had become a part of him, life of his life. He could give up everything else, if necessary, but not Bob! Not Bob!

Determined to know every smallest detail of her last hours in the house, he cross-questioned Janet, finally wringing from her an admission that she had told Roberta of his quarrel with his father. Too anxious to visit upon her the condemnation she expected, and which otherwise would have been her lot, he exacted from her every word of that conversation. And then he knew. Bob had gone to Birchwood—or to Nixon, sacrificing herself and Celia in the hope that he might still be saved. And the only thing in the world he wanted was Bob! Noble, generous, selfless Bob! Miserable, unworthy Galahad!

But as the hours wore on into afternoon, doubts began again to assail him. Surely, if Roberta had confessed to her father, or even if she had merely joined Nixon, some one would come for Celia, and the detectives, still holding their post, would be dismissed. Where could she be?

The thought of the Whangdoodle's straits recurred to trouble him. Cody had said that Scott might strike at any moment, and if Roberta had not seen Nixon or her father, something must be done to prevent that injustice. If nothing happened before night, he would make Celia—hopelessly weeping in the house—array herself in Mrs. Smith's discarded weeds, close the temporary establishment, and get away in the car with the girl and Janet, trusting to the darkness to help him elude the motor-cycle man before reaching New York. If necessary, he could precipitate a fight and knock the fellow out.

With the women off his hands, safely hidden in Brooklyn, he would return alone to Birchwood, perhaps in time to save Nixon from Scott's vengeance. Then they could jail him, if they wanted to—as Peter Brown. Nothing mattered now, without Bob.

After Janet's harrowing revelations Roberta went to her room, mazed in deep and desperate thought. Peter in disgrace with his father. Peter disinherited and cast out, because he had championed another outcast. Peter choosing to be deprived of everything else he held precious, rather than break his word to a girl he hated and despised—a girl whom he believed to have no sense of honor. Oh, Galahad, indeed! Oh, Bayard! Oh, souls of all white heroes of eld reincarnated in one glorious young body—to be martyred for an idea? It simply must not be!

Already her debt to him was too great. Even in the excitement of rescuing Celia and circumventing the pursuers, even in the happy daily intercourse with Peter—warmed by what in her vanity she had believed to be camaraderie, and now perceived to have been merely his devotion to a chivalric ideal impersonal to her—she had been uneasily aware of that mounting column of indebtedness. Forced by untoward circumstances to consider immediate requital, its sum appalled her.

The largest items could be repaid only by service in kind, an obligation she might carry undischarged to her grave. The money—and Peter would need money, now that his father had cut him off—she could return, at a price. Recoiling momentarily, as she thought of what must be given for it, she strengthened herself with the memory of Peters unhesitating sacrifice for a principle. She had accepted freely from him, and freely must she pay. Once before she had bargained with Clif, making Celia's deliverance the condition upon which she would marry him. He had failed here there. Now she would bargain again, her meed the sum she owed Peter—and this time Clif should not fail.

There was no other way. Time pressed. It must be done at once, for Peter's sake and for her own. A marriage de convenance, with a man she liked and respected, could be endured, but she could not rest another day under this weight of obligation to one who clearly despised her; much less could she accept further aid from him. If possible his latest and greatest sacrifice must be prevented. Surely it was not too late; something could still be done about that—something must be done, quickly. But, she must plan for Celia, too.

Peter's father had said that there was one legal method by which she ould have obtained her sister's freedom, and if so, it could still be used. The best way to find out about that was to consult a lawyer, and as she might be recognized in Keene, she would go to Worcester—no Boston! Peter's father had gone to Boston. She would find him there—or follow him to New York, if necessary—and try to pay in service to his son at least a part of what she owed. Incidentally, she might demonstrate to a certain stern young knight that all grls were not devoid of honor at all times.

SWEDEN'S PRINCE TO VISIT DETROIT ON FEBRUARY 12

Arrangements have been completed for the visit of Prince William, of Sweden, to Detroit, Saturday, February 26. Prince William will speak that day at the Detroit Athletic Club.

Negotiations also are underway to have the prince remain in the city over the week-end and to present his pictures and speak at a public meeting the following Monday evening in Orchestra Hall.

At his Detroit engagements Prince William will show moving pictures taken in Central Africa while he was leading the latest wild game expedition of the Swedish National Museum. He will lecture along with his screen program.

The American tour of the prince will carry him to 40 of the larger cities. The most westerly point scheduled is Kansas City. On completion of the tour he will sail immediately for Italy.

ORGANIST SETS RECORD WITH 43 YEARS ON JOB

Robert A. Hungerford has established an unusual record of having served as organist of the First Methodist Episcopal Church in Lapeer for 43 years, rarely missing a Sunday service.

Mr. Hungerford was born in Lapeer County 58 years ago. Although he never had a music instructor, he loved music and studied by himself until he mastered the organ. He has served the city as alderman, member of the water board and city treasurer, and for the last five years as city clerk.

Mr. Hungerford is the father of four children, all of them musicians.

PHEASANTS AT STATE PARK AT MUSKEGON ARE PREY OF FOXES

A black and red fox are making their homes at the Muskegon State Park and causing much damage to the wild life, especially to the hundreds of pheasants living at the 800-acre tract.

The black fox is believed to have escaped from one of the many ranches in this section. The animal is quite tame and has been seen frequently. The red fox has been seen many times during the last few months, and there has been much evidence of its destruction, according to Nick Trilweller, park custodian.

It is likely that efforts will be made to kill the two. The Muskegon State Park, with its hundreds of acres of virgin timber, is one of the best game reserves in Michigan. It borders along the Muskegon Lake and Lake Michigan and forms a natural refuge for game life.

Long before the tract was made a state park and the game protected, the water along its shores was favored by ducks.

STURGIS WOMAN IS WELFARE LEAGUE

Two years ago the Welfare League of Sturgis disbanded because of lack of funds. There seemed no way of looking after the families on whom fortune had not smiled. And then, little by little, Sturgis began to realize it had in its midst a new welfare league consisting of one woman, "full of good works and alms deeds."

This modern Dorcas was Mrs. Ruby L. Ginther. Her headquarters was in a serve-self shoe store on a side street. Her "league" waged no campaign for funds; it maintained no offices; it had no constitution, no by-laws, no membership roll, no paid employes. Its equipment consisted of a sympathetic heart, a skillful pair of hands and a sewing machine.

Mrs. Ginther let it be known that if the people of the city would bring in their castoff clothing, she would remodel it and dispense it to those in need. Soon the sewing machine in the corner of the shoe store was humming away, whenever there wasn't a customer waiting.

The poor and the needy learned where to go when their garments wore out, as garments will. They learned that Mrs. Ginther, though she had a husband and two boys of her own, had a heart big enough to mother the whole town. So they began to tell her their troubles; and she responded with whatever help was needed, whether it was just a kindly word of encouragement, a bit of homely advice or a series of evenings spent in washing dishes and scrubbing floors.

That is why the Welfare League has never been reorganized. Mrs. Ginther has taken over all its functions. She enjoys the work, she says, and apparently the people of the city enjoy letting her do it.

MICHIGAN OWNER OF LARGEST HERD OF PURE HOLSTEINS

The state of Michigan leads the world as the biggest owner and breeder of purebred Holstein cattle, according to H. W. Norton, director of the bureau of animal husbandry of the state department of agriculture.

Norton asserted that the state now owns 1,700 registered Holsteins. They are kept at the various institutions, and include one cow, Colantha Traverse Walker, which, in 1919, made a record for butter fat that has never been equalled.

The cost of the herd to the state was little, according to Norton. He said the start was made in 1885, when the state bought 15 cows and a bull for $1,500. Later the state paid $150 for Pontiac Korndyke, now one of the most famous Holstein sires in the country. It used him for several years and then sold him for $1,000. The value of the present herd of 1,700 cattle would be hard to estimate, according to Norton.

Among the state's herds those at Ionia state prison and at the Pontiac state hospital are the best known among dairymen and cattle breeders.

BREEDER OF WILD GEESE IS DEAD AT NUNICA HOME

Henry Stark, 74 years old, known throughout Western Michigan for raising wild geese and ducks, is dead at his home in Nunica. Mr. Stark has been raising wild geese for more than 50 years and has several geese more than 80 years old.

Mr. Stark exhibited his wild geese at various shows throughout the state. They are quite tame. The geese were brought from Canada shortly after the Civil War. Mr. Stark said that one of the birds was around 100 years of age.

The Nunica man devoted much attention to the study of wild life and had marked success in the raising of geese and ducks. The birds were used as decoys by hundreds of duck hunters in this section.

WHY KNOCKS ARE IN AUTOMOBILES

It's poor driving, probably, that causes the first clinking of the engine when it pulls up a hill. Later, if that isn't corrected, it turns out to be a knock that can be taken out only by the garage mechanic.

This, of course, is the most common of all engine knocks. There are a dozen or more other varieties.

The clink, clank of the engine when it's pulling hard, however, results first from the fact that the driver fails to use the spark lever properly at such times, and then from the presence of too much carbon in the cylinders.

A slight move of the spark lever, retarding the spark, usually corrects the first fault.

Retarding the spark when starting or when going up hill gives the engine a chance to pull harder and at a slower speed. It makes use of all the mixture fed into the cylinders, at the proper time and with unified results.

Failure to retard the spark when the engine gets an extra load hastens the end of that engine. Further, it contributes to the accumulation of unwanted carbon on the pistons, around the valves and on the cylinder heads.

Carbon, too much of it, causes a knock similar to the spark knock. But this can't be controlled by retarding the spark. The carbon has to be removed.

The cause of carbon accumulation may be too rich a mixture, poorly fitted or loose pistons permitting the lubricating oil to be injected into the cylinders, an overheated engine, or poor crankcase oil.

Outside of the spark knock, which can be remedied by the driver, all other forms notify the motorist of troubles that must be corrected by the garage mechanic. If it's only the carbon knock, least harmful of all, power is lost, fuel is wasted and the engine is worn down faster, until the knock is cleaned out.

Another kind of a knock that requires immediate and expert attention is the main bearing variety—a sort of deep, heavy thud-thud while the car is going on the level. The bearings need tightening or replacement. In any case, they must be attended to immediately. In fact, at times it's unsafe even to go along until a garage is reached.

The main bearing knock will be loudest under a pull or load. If a bearing is unusually loose, it will cause the engine to vibrate excessively when it is speeded up.

There's danger of breaking the crankshaft if it isn't corrected immediately.

A light pound, or sometimes a clatter, means loose connecting rod bearings, and if they're completely burned out they'll be heard at all times under all conditions. Usually, however, they're apparent when the car is going at about 20 to 30 miles an hour.

A knock almost similar to the carbon knock is that of piston slap, which is due to loose pistons or worn piston rings.

Lack of proper lubrication in the timing gears will cause another sort of knock, a loose flywheel another.

Loose cylinder nuts, connecting rods out of alignment, worn valve stems and valve guides, loose wrist pins are other engine troubles that cause knocking.

STUDENTS TO STUDY DISEASES OF MIND AT STATE INSTITUTIONS

Students in the class on heredity and eugenics at Michigan State college plan a series of trips to state institutions for the insane and feeble-minded as part of their study of hereditary influences affecting the mind of the individual.

The trips which are being considered include visits to the hospital for the insane at Pontiac, the Michigan Home and Training School at Lapeer, where representative cases of feeble-mindedness will furnish material for study; and the asylum for the epileptic at Wahjamega. These visits will be made as a part of the regular class work for the winter term.

BLACK BEAR BURIES MATE, HUNTERS FIND FOLLOWING TRAIL

The intelligence of the black bear is attested by the story the settlers near McMillan, Mich., tell of two hunters' experience.

As related, one of them had shot a bear one evening. Finding it too heavy to hang up, he left it on the ground and returned to camp. Next morning with his companions he returned to find the bear gone. Around the scene was the tracks of another bear.

Following these tracks they came to a brush pile. Digging in they found their dead bear. It was evident the bear's mate had come during the night, carried away his dead comrade and attempted to hide his body away from those who would despoil it.

Mike Grajewski is reported to have said that it was the Schooner Ale that was the fault of so many rough seas.

Lily bulbs will not prosper in the house unless the water in which they grow is changed twice a week, and they are kept in a cool place.

Wilson of Greenville Is Condoled

While it is a criminal offense to shoot any person in cold blood unless it be to really defend your own life, yet farmers all over Michigan are getting into the game concerning the shooting scrape up at Greenville which resulted in the death of one citizen. L. J. Wilson the owner of the chicken coop, did what nine-tenths of us probably would do under like circumstance but the question is, if life is to be held so cheaply in this nation, can we expect the bootlegger to respect the law?

We are hearing considerable about the shooting of officers while on their duties as guardians of property and to uphold the dry law. In fact the murders of brave officers who go after "booze runners" is getting on our nerves so badly that law makers are urged to get some kind of a statute on the books to make it absolutely proper for an officer to shoot point blank at any suspect who refuses to halt when requested. In the city of Detroit alone, the number of murders of officers in one year would appall you. Out in the open on the various trunk lines through the country conditions are but little better. Mounted police are fired upon as commonly as a hold-up man would be in the dead of night Now the whole problem hinges on the upholding of the law.

So enthusiastic are the rural folk becoming that one farmer sent in quite a sum of money to aid Mr. Wilson also a letter of warm commendation for the deed. Taken outside the law as a matter of justice, it might perhaps be said the foundryman who was killed likely was a worthless specimen—more than that, he was a menace to his neighbors, and so his taking off could not be called a calamity except that if he was the head of a family, it was a calamity to them nothing more. On the other hand, that old command "Thou Shalt Not Kill" comes up before the vision, and all law is based on the scriptural commandments. The Michigan Business Farmer has gone crazy over the Greenville case, and is trying by every means to make public sentiment optimistic over the Wilson murder. We do not believe Wilson should be punished for protecting his own property and killing the iron moulder—far from it. But we do believe he should be severely dealt with for contempt of law. That is the only means in this world to make the law stronger than it is. No jury composed of farmers would ever convict such a man as Wilson for manslaughter. He would be acquitted, but the laws of human nature and the laws of the state are two different things.

The general sentiment probably would say to Wilson as well as others similarly troubled "shoot every man who appears around your premises after nightfall unless he can explain his reasons for being there" but the statute of Michigan would say "any man who commits murder by taking a fellow being's life because he appears to be trespassing and without due investigation is guilty of manslaughter". Out in the West in "gold rush" days there was no law except the vigilance committee who might visit a man's house in the dead of night masked and armed, take the man from his home and severely flog him or kill him and there was no repeal. This was done many times and sad to relate sometimes the wrong man died or was misused by the "white caps" or the "Molly Maguires" as the case might be. The crime was avenged but society was outraged to do it. We hope Michigan is not a state without laws and means to administer them. Judges sit on the bench for that purpose though at times it seems as if they were under the domination of the Almighty dollar. If Mr. Wilson gets clear we hope it will be in such a way as not to compromise the strength of law.

EXAMS GIVE WAY TO SPRING SPORT

"The Battle of the Blue Books," in other words the annual mid year examination period, is over at Ann Arbor and the wearied athletes are turning their steps once more to the field house to reusme preparations for basket ball, track, base ball, wrestling, while the swimmers hold forth at the Union pool, contests during the new semester.

Basket ball is the principal rage as the track season does not begin until Saturday, when the annual Ollinois relays are held at Urbana. Base ball still is too far away for notice as yet. Consequently, the chances of Michigan to land the western conference basket ball title leads most of the athletic discussions.

Height favors Michigan this season and this physical asset has been capitalized to the limit in slap passing, follow up shots and long passes. Only a tall team can work a long pass game consistently and obtain points en route.

On defense, the Michigan men smother their opponents, allow few rebounds, and generally get the ball off the backboard and up the floor if the shot is missed. Few teams have ever made more of natural assets than Michigan.

While the basket ball team is taking most of the bows, the track men are working daly for the Big Ten meet, Illinois relay, and the annual dual with Cornell. They get their meed of notice first at Illinois, later at Evanston. rPospects are good but no predictions are made because of the strength shown by other conference teams.

Coach Ray Fisher has base ball practice under way. So far, only battery men have been given equipment. Use of the field house is restricted until after the basket ball season ends on March 7, but enough practice is possible to givxe Fisher a basis for selecting the squad for the early outdoor drill, if any, and for the annual southern trip.

FARMERS DEFEND SLAYER OF THIEF

It is all right to shot at a man if you find him prowling in your chicken house, in the opinion of farmers of Michigan, and they are rallyng to the support of L. J. Wilson, of Greenville, who will be tried in March for causing the death of Edward Sixbury, a Greenville iron molder.

Wilson himself finds his mail box full of letters every day from farmer sympathizers in all parts of Michigan and, for that matter, in many distant states. They express the hope that the jury will refuse to convict him for protecting his property against thieves.

Pressure is also being brought to bear on Judge Royal E. Hawley of Ionia, who will hear the case, to persuade him to recommend the dismissal of the mans'aughter charge.

Wilson owns a 20-acre farm near Ionia. About 11:30 on the night before Thanksgiving, his son Ralph noticed a car stop by their barn and he awakened his father. Mr. Wilson got dressed hurriedly and with rifle in hand rushed out to the hen house which he charges had been broken into. He declared he found one man robbing the roost while a second stood guard.

At a command to hault, according to Wilson's story, one man, William Telfor, obeyed, but the other started running toward the road. After calling to him several times to stop, Mr. Wilson says, he shot low, with the idea of frightening the man into surrender. When the man, who proved to be Edward Sixbury, was finally caught, he protested that he was uninjured. But examination at the hospital revealed that he had been shot in the adbomen. He died a few hours later. He left a widow and six children.

CURRICULUM CHANGED AT COLLEGE OF MINES

Material changes in the curriculum of the Michigan College of Mines have been made by the faculty and board of control.

The three-year course at the college has been requiring about 15 per cent more work than other engineering colleges have been requiring in a four-year course. Accordingly, the amount of work required for a degree was fixed to correspond with the amount required by the best engineering colleges. This will give the students some time to devote to recreation and athletics.

In addition to the degrees of engineer of mines and engineer of metallurgy, the college also will offer three new degrees, those of bachelor of science in geology, bachelor of science in chemistry and bachelor of science in general engineering.

MYSTERY OF TROUT SCARCITY BELIEVED SOLVED BY SCIENCE

In spite of the fact that millions and millions of trout are planted in the streams of the state, trout fishing has grown ever worse.

What becomes of all the fry that goes into our streams at an enormous cost to the state? No one up to the present has been able to answer? Now comes Dr. Rutheven, head of the zoology department of the University of Michigan, with announcement of a discovery that will enable the scientists to solve the problem.

According to Dr. Rutheven, one of his department has discovered a new method by which he can tell whether a fish taken from a stream was spawned and hatched there naturally or whether it came from planted fry, artificially raised.

If this discovery works out as expected, this will for the first time enable the authorities to secure some data on the success or failure of past fish planting, from which they can work toward the attainment of methods that may bring more appreciable returns than any thing ever yet attempted here or elsewhere.

PUT $60, 000, 000 FUR CROP VALUE

A vigorous protest against classing all fur bearing animals everywhere under all conditions as "vermine" was voiced at the recent convention of state game commissioners by Frank G. Ashbrook, in charge of for investigations for the United States Bureau of Biological Survey.

The value of the fur crop of this country, said Mr. Ashbrook, has increased in 25 years from $25,000,000 to $60,000,000, yet the supply has been greatly depleted. Had the supply been maintained the present value of the fur taken would be measurably greater than it is.

The status of fur bearing animals, in the opinion of Mr. Ashbrook, with relation to other forms of wild animal life, should be investigated fully in each locality so that there might not be unnecessary destruction of any valuable form.

Laws protecting fur bearers are of comparatively recent origin in most states, and many states even now give ineffective protection or none at all.

The great curse of the fur business is the vast quantity of worthless pelts taken out of the proper season either illegally or with the sanction of law.

Mr. Ashbrook points out that muskrat, now the most important species of fur bearer in point of total value, is prime in late winter and in early spring and should not be taken in the fall when the pelt is worthless, while the skunk, mink and some others reach a condition of primeness earlier and become valueless late in winter.

Laws giving protection at the season of the year when the fur is of little value and during the breeding season are strongly advocated.

BARN OWL IS HELD WORTH 12 CATS IN CATCHING RODENTS

The barn owl is as valuable to the farmer as a dozen cats. Of all the owls, none is more destructive of rats and mice than this big, fluffy, monkey faced member of the family, which makes its home in the barn. During the day the owl sleeps on its perch on the rafters, disdaining the human activity beneath, but as soon as the night arrives, it becomes possessed of a firce ambition to catch and eat every rodent in the vicinity. Like a dark shadow, the barn owl swoops over the garden, the berry patch and granary, pouncing upon every tiny furry form that shows itself. A squeak and it is all over—there is a tremendous drive to those lethal talons, whose points are sharp as those of a needle.

Necessity, not choice, makes the barn owl a persistent hunter of rats and mice, for this bird is goaded by an insatiable appetite. A mature owl can easily eat its weight of food in a single night. Not long ago a naturalist tested the capacity of a barn owl by feeding it one mouse right after another. The owl swallowed eight mice in quick succession and then hopped solemnly upon its perch with the tail of the last mouse hanging from its beak. Literally speaking, the bird was full of mice. But three hours later the owl's rapid digestion had come to its relief, it was hungry again and this time it tossed off four more of the mice.

"Oldest and Newest"--In Texas

The "oldest and newest" in Texas is aptly illustrated in the above photograph taken at San Antonio. The smaller structure in the foreground is the historic Alamo, the oldest building in the Lone Star state, built in 1718. Overshadowing it in the back ground, is the Medical Arts Building, erected in 1926.

MANY BUCKS DIE WHEN HORNS LOCK IN BATTLE

In the rutting season, buck deer become extremely pugnacious and violent and do much fighting. Occasionally they will clash horns and the sudden shock of the impact will lock the horns together in such a manner that it is impossible to extricate them. Then begins a terrible death. The deer soon tire of holding their heads in the same position. They can not eat and gradually they grow weaker until one lies down and dies. The dead deer serves as an anchor for the other and before long he, too, lies down to die. This occurs with both mule deer and the Virginia white tailed deer of Michigan. Not infrequently the hunter, the timber cruiser or prospector will then stumble on the skeletons of two deer, the horns still locked in the death grip.

WOLF BOUNTY PAID ON HUNGRY COLLIE

In the winter of 1912 the late Dodd Woods conducted a hotel at Lake St. Clair near Windmill Pointe. He was an ardent nimrod and considered a good shot.

At that time Wayne county was paying a bounty of $25 for every wolf brought in. Woods read in the papers of several wild animals being shot in this vicinity, three lynx one at Walpole Island, another at Fairhaven and one near Tilbury, Ontario. Two cross foxes, rare animals, had been killed at Fairhaven.

So Woods decided to keep his eyes open for some more of these predatory animals and one winter day while looking across the lake toward Peache Island he noticed something with fur and four legs coming across the ice. Woods seized his rifle and fired at what he believed was a sure enough wolf.

The animal, wounded, leaped at Woods with teeth bared and snarling. Another shot and the animal fell dead. It was not long before the news went around Detroit that a big timber wolf had been killed.

A few days later Woods took the carcass to the county clerk of Wayne, but the official would not pay the bounty until the game warden was called to give his expert testimony. The warden declared the animal was the real article of wolf and paid the $25 bounty to Woods.

The fortunate nimrod was so much pleased that he took the carcass to a Detroit taxidermist to have it mounted. He wanted to have his grandchildren see what the last wolf ever to be shot in that section looked like.

Woods never knew that the so-called wolf was merely a stray and hungry collie dog for the taxidermist never divulged the secret.

Following the death of Woods, the taxidermist bought the specimen from the family and has kept it in a glass covering to this day.

LONE SURVIVOR OF SHIP HORROR

To us, in this time of peace and plenty, the carnage and horror of the World War a few years ago are already receding into the dim past. But the mind of Nathaniel Foglesang of Waldron, reverts to the Civil War of long ago, to weary months of near starvation in a southern prison and, still more vividly, to one April night in 1865 when a ship loaded with hundreds of returning soldiers was the scene of an awful holocaust.

The ship was the Sultana. It was carrying 2,300 people up the Mississippi river. Near Memphis one of the boilers exploded, plunging the boat into flames. Only about 450 escaped.

It was just the day before that Abraham Lincoln had fallen victim to an assassin's bullet in a Washington theater. The American people were stunned by this catastrophe, and they paid little attention to the Sultana disaster which followed close upon its heels.

Perhaps this explains in some measure why history books in use in the schools have scarcely mentioned the Sultana.

The 450 survivors, however, organized the National Sultana Survivor's association and gathered once a year for a reunion at Toledo, Ohio.

Year by year the number attending these reunions has been growing smaller and smaller, until in 1926 there were only two. Mr. Foglesang was not able to attend.

Most of the soldiers on board were from Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee and West Virginia. Those listed from Michigan numbered 216. There is no record as to how many of these escaped. Mr. Foglesang believes he is the only one from Michigan still living.

The steamer Sultana, built in 1863, made regular trips between New Orleans and St. Louis. It left New Orleans on its last and fatal trip April 21, 1865.

EDITORS HOBBY RARE WEAPONS

Guns have been the hobby of Ira Adams, editor of the Charlevoix Sentinel since he was 14 years old. In the collection, which stands in cases behind his desk in his newspaper office, are more than 250 specimens, dating from the torch lock guns of 400 years ago to the most modern rifles, automatics and revolvers. He has in a handsome mahogany box the guns that William Livingstone, famous explorer, carried with him to Africa.

The boys of Charlevoix visit the Sentinel offce at all hours of the day to see what to the male youth of the species is an enthralling collection. Summer tourists keep Mr. Adams busy showing his treasures. If any one is interested, whether local small boy or wealthy visitor from Chicago or St. Louis,, Mr. Adams is always willing to go to the glass case and take from the the choicest specimens for inspection. After each handling of the weapons it is noticeable that the exposed metal parts are carefully wiped with a silk handkerchief.

The barrels of the Livingstone guns are of metal treated to resist rust. They can be left in salt water several hours without injury. These guns antedate high explosives and smokeless powder and so, in order to kill lions, tigers, elephants and other big game, shot a two-ounce bullet. Mr. Livingstone's cannister of powder and his whalebone ramrod repose beside his weapons in the plush lined case.

Duelling pistols used in the last duel fought in the United States are among the high spots in the collection. This encounter took place in 1849 on the shore of Lake Mercede, near Santa Barbara, California.

Another weapon that catches the eye is a 45-calibre frontier gun from Tombstone, Arizona, that has the peculiarity of declining to remain cocked. This, says the owner, was because the western gunmen shot too rapidly to want a pistol that would remain cocked. Instead their quick fire weapons were "fanned"—which means that their thumb jerked back the trigger for each shot that was fired.

The collection includes Filipion bolos, beheading axes, Japanese two-handed swords, the cannon made for the Lincoln club in Chicago and used in the two Lincoln campaigns, armor and even such humble instruments of personal warfare as the Irish shillelah. This particular shillelah was sent from Ireland to Comiskey, the base ball magnate, for St. Patrick's Day 14 years ago.

Whether a one-mill tax shall be levied for the supoprt of the public library at Ithaca is to be decided by Ithaca voters at the spring election.

LIZARDS ARE CENTER OF BATTLE BETWEEN GULLS

Fishermen who spend their time catching perch through the ice have found a new sport to amuse them while waiting for the next bite. Occasionally a hungry lizard spots the impaled minnow and proceeds to get a square meal which brings it nothing but grief. The fishermen, however, are happy when one is hauled to the surface for it affords amusement to the entire fishing colony. The lizard is placed on the ice and within a few seconds there are at least a half a hundred herring gulls fighting for it. Apparently the gulls consider the lizard a great delicacy, for they all put up a hard fight for the prize. Finally the fortunate bird takes the lizard by the head and after a short struggle swallows it alive.

COUNTY ADMINISTRATORS ARE NAMED BY STATE

The following appointments of public administrators for counties were announced by Ralph Hughes, assistant attorney-general and state public administrator: John Pullen of Jackson for Jackson county, Martin Cook of Greenville for Montcalm county, Glenn Cowell of Coldwater for Branch county, Jacob Dalm of Kalamazoo for Kalamazoo county, Miles Bowersox of Nottawa for St. Joseph county, Clarence Butler of Benton Harbor for Berrien county, Horace H. Adams of Paw Paw for Van Buren county, J J. Smolenski of Grand Rapids for Kent county, George F. Macklan of Manistee for Manistee county.

3,000 TEACHERS OF THIRD DISTRICT TO MEET IN JACKSON

Plans already are under way for the housing and entertainment of 3,000 school teachers who will come to Jackson October 20 and 21 to take part in the annual convention of the third district of the Michigan State Teachers' association. Announcement that the meeting will be held in Jackson was received from E. T. Cameron, executive secretary of the association.

The third district includes Hillsdale, Lenawee, Eaton, Ingham, Clinton, Shiwassee and Jackson counties. The 1925 convention was held in Jackson and that of last year in Lansing.

FARMING COURSE KEEPS BOYS HOME

Fremont believes that it has discovered a way to keep boys on the farm and make them leaders in agricultural work. The plan, which has done much to place farming on a paying basis, was establishing a course in agriculture in the Fremont high school 12 years ago.

The course was established after insistent demands made by prominent nent farmers in the section, and today it is admitted that the step has yielded big returns. The farmers held that such a course would serve to keep the boys on the farms, and the results of the 12 years' experience has borne out their predictions.

In the former days most of the boys left the farms when thew graduated. Now, every year the high school turns out about 25 boys who become leaders in their communities in agriculture. Every year there is an increase in the number taking the course in farming.

Keats Vining, now agricultural agent of Kent county, and A. R. Shigley, once superintendent of schools, worked out a practical course in agriculture. The course the first year was botany or farm crops with farm carpentry. The second year horticulture is taken up.

From this course the boys have learned to care for their own orchards scientifically. They are also educated n planting, care and production of small fruit, which is fast becoming a major crop.

The third year is devoted to animal husbandry. That this course has brought fine results is indicated in the experience of one boy whose father gave him free rein in building up a herd. The boy used only the knowledge he gained in school and today he has one of the finest herds in the county.

In the fourth year the boys devote one semester to studying soils. In the last half of the senior year they sum up the work of the past. This course is called farm management, and it gives the student an insight into the financial side of the farm.

NET AND DIAMOND COACHES PANNED

Two intercollegiate athletic offices are always marked by excess demand over supply—those of basket ball coach and basket ball official.

Each is one of the world's two great thankless tasks. The coach is censured beyond all proportion to his mistakes, principally because of an element in each institution that looks upon him as a little tin god who cannot err. An official takes the shafts of scorn from the same element.

Perhaps the best critics of coaches—former players, fellow coaches, and officials are usually silent because they know the problem of coaching. Assuming the coach knows the game, is a matter of material. The best critics of officials seldom break out for they know the difficulties met.

Basket ball officials are always unpopular because they do the duty they owe to the game. The man who escapes storms of booes and hisses during the game is as rare as the fellow who will give $50 for a dime. It is the unpopularity of the rules, however, that bring the wrath of the crowds at college or other games.

And the average spectator at a game is too dumb to realize that it is the playing code he should castigate instead of abusing the officials who must call fouls as the book directs. Few spectators stop to think that the rules as they now read bar personal contact so completely that almost any sincere effort on the part of the defense to check the attack results in a foul.

To stop the play, the defensive man must either foul or let his man run through to the net for an easy goal. If the man with the ball is fouled the official must call it. He has no other choice but try and get the spectators to see it that way. The rules demand the calling of fouls when made.

Coaches who teach their men to shade the rules as much as possible raise most of the trouble to which the hard pressed official must submit.

Any guarding from behind is a foul unless the player gets a hand on the ball and does not impede the progress of the offensive man. An offensive player who consciously or unconsciously charges a defensive man from the rear and makes contact is also fouling. But in every game when the alert official calls these fouls, just listen to the yelps from the second guesses who lack either the time or the patience to study the rules.

With the barring of personal contact, the defense can do aught else than slow up and let the offense go. Few players risk fouls if the rival team is good at foul shooting. Few clean players risk fouls anyway because they know they are not the game.

STOLEN ANTLERS ARE STILL SOUGHT

Nearly three months have passed since Michigan deer hunters of 1926 abandoned their camps in the north woods, but still William L. Culver, Grand Rapids real estate man, is keeping up a relentless search for the head of a buck of phenomenal size stolen from his camp in Alpena county in November.

The long search, without parallel in deer hunting annals, will end, Mr. Culver hopes, in bringing to justice the men who carried off the buck and the recovery of the animal's head and nine-point antlers which brought wondering hunters from far and wide to the Culver camp last fall.

For several years the back, known to hunters and woodsmen as "Branson's Billy," was seen and shot at in the slashings near the Alpena-Alcona county line. But always the animal, which weighed more than 400 pounds and carried antlers larger than an elk, escaped the hunters.

Last fall Mr. Culver, who has hunted with his wife in the north many seasons and has always returned with game, found where "Branson's Billy" had rested in a thicket after a light snowfall.

On the day before the season opened, the buck was seen standing on a hill near Culver's camp, disappearing when the hunters saw him. On November 19, Culver tracked the buck and finally brought him down with a shot through the heart.

For two days the buck hung at the camp and then, during the second night, it was stolen.

American industries use many odd machines in the production of their commodities, but perhaps the oddest are the machines for testing the power of adhesive tape, the deformation of golf balls under driving stress, the strength of casket handles and the tractive efforts of elephants.

Radio Topics

This radio section is conducted by the staff of the Federated Radio Trade School, 4464 Cass Avenue, Detroit, Mich. Any questions or problems should be sent to the Editor of this newspaper, where they will be referred to th school technicans and promptly answered without charge.

The past year marks a sweeping advance in the quality of radio programs, and the owners and operators of broadcasting stations promise even better programs for 1927. The high standards already employed in the larger stations are to be maintained, according to the latest reports received. The larger stations are adopting even more stringent regulations regarding the broadcasting of advertising matter. There will no longer be speeches descriptive of various products, but advertisement will be limited to a simple announcement of the name of the manufacturer that is sponsoring the program.

Last year's programs included many world famous attractions. Among them were Rosa Ponselle, Madam Schuman Heink, Vincent Lopez' Orchestra, President Coolidge, Will Rogers, Walter Damroch, the late Rudolph Valentino, and many others of equal note.

No estimate has been made as to the aprpoximate amount that would have been spent for tickets had all the radio listeners had to pay usual box office rates to listen to these stellar attractions, but the sum would be so vast, as to be almost beyond human comprehension.

In adidtion to running equally great features this year, the practical side of radio will be mentioned. Weather reports, market reports, storm and frost warnings, news events, etc., will continue to be broadcasted on a regular schedule.

The truly remarkable part of all this is that once the apparatus is installed, there is practically no operating cost, and these is no tax or charge of any kind made to radio listeners in this country, although, in all foreign countries, listeners are assessed in varied amounts to support the broadcasting stations and pay for the programs. We may indeed consider ourselves fortunate that the burden of this tremendous expense is born by the advertisers and not by us, the long suffering general public.

It has gotten to the point where the man whose home is not equipped with radio receiving apparatus is actually cheating himself out of endless free entertainment and education.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Radio Editor:
Dear Sir:

Is it true that an aerial on the house tends to attract lightening?

G. W. C.

No. On the contrary, a properly installed aerial equipped with an approved lightening arrester, acts as a lightening rod and safeguards the house or other buildings to which it is attached. It decreases the fire hazards too. Any lightening that would otherwise strike the house will be conducted harmlessly down the earial, through the lightening arrestor to the ground. It works somewhat like a lightening rod in this connection.

Dear Sir:

I have just finished building a radio set and notice that when I turn it on, the tubes do not light, but the rheostat gets red hot and begins to smoke. What is the trouble?

L. C. S.

You will find that you have made an incorrect connection, short-circuiting the "A" batetry leads to one or more sockets. You will therefore get a short circuit through a wire connection. Thus too much grid is being drawn through the rheostat, causing it to heat, and none is going through the tubes, as the resistance of the wire is so much lower than the resistance of the tube filamnts.

Dear Sir:

I wish to purchase a five tube radio set and would like to know the name of a good mail order house to buy it from. I have been in touch with several, but would like to know which you recommend.

A. E. C.

While all of the larger mail order houses are reputable and respectable concerns, it would be wiser to buy your radio apparatus from a local dealer. The reason for this is that your local man can help you install, or install the set for you, can come out to inspect it should this be necessary and will be able to give you prompt service in case any accidents occur to the set, making such repairs and adjustments as are necessary. It is somewhat like buying a car, it pays to buy in your own town so that you can get service on it without having to wait several weeks. You are only getting your money's worth as long as the set is actually working in your house.

LAPEER MUCK IS IDEAL FOR CELERY

If plans now under way materialize, Imlay City may yet rival Kalamazoo as a celery center. Three Detroit men, Hugh Connolly, Theodore W. Resch and Samuel Glass, have purchased 600 acres of muck land just north and a little east of Imlay City, to be devoted to the raising of celery.

A modern cold storage plant will be built and experimental work will be carried on as soon as the weather allows. Resch will direct the work personally.

Large & Butler were the first men in the section to enter the celery business; their farm has reached considerable proportions, "Belle River" celery taking no mean place on the Port Huron, Flint, Pontiac and Detroit markets.

A few years after the Belle River celery farms began to attract attention, mainly because of the unusually fine quality of the celery grown, a competitor acquired land just across the road, and now both firms are doing a big business.

There are several thousand acres of rich muck land ling in a swale running east and north from Imlay City for several miles and while the land is adapted to general farming, celery makes an especially fine growth here.

Various attempts have been made in the past to commercialize the rich deposits of muck, the latest being the manufacture of peat for use in stables, henhouses and other place where straw, saw dust and shavings formerly were used. This project is proving profitable, the New York Peat corporation having taken over the old paper mill property midway between Imlay City and Capac.

Many persons can remember when thousands of acres of muck land in this depression were covered with water much of the time. The celebrated Lapeer-St. Clair county line sinkholes, which caused the financial ruin of a number of road contractors and caused both Lapeer and St. Clair counties to lose thousands of dollars, lie in this strip.

There is an old Indian legend that one time, before the coming of the white man, a portion of a tribe of Indians at war with the other tribes of the vicinity, was penned in this swale and kept there until the last Indian warrior died of starvation and sank in the slime that covered many of the lower spots.

When you don't like a certain dish, there is sure to be plenty of it on the table.

CARO MAN HEARS FROM FATHER AFTER 32 YEARS

Bert Burley of Caro recently heard from his father for the first time in his life—32 years. Bert's mother died at his birth, and when less than a month old he was taken to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Hoover, at Owosso. Until he was 22 years old, he believed that his guardians were actually his parents. The elder Burley, who now lives in Frankford, Ontario, told his son in his letter that he just had been able to ascertain the latter's whereabouts after years of search.

FENNVILLE WOULD CUT VARIETIES OF APPLES

The Fenville Fruit Exchange will endeavor further to reduce the number of apple varieties to be packed by the exchange this year.

A year ago the growers voted to reduce the number of varieties eligible for packing from 133 to 50. The management, is is understood, would like to lop off 10 more varieties, believing the exchange could obtain better prices for the growers' fruit if it specialized in fewer and better varieties.

LAKE COTTAGE OWNERS UNITE AGAINST THIEVES

As a means of protecting their property against burglars and petty thieves, owners of cottages and summer homes on Lake Michigan, between Grand Haven and Holland, have organized the Cottage Owners' Protective Association.

One of the immediate objects of the association will be the offering of liberal rewards for the apprehension and conviction of persons damaging resort property of members.

DOGS EQUAL WOLVES AS MENACE TO WILD LIFE

Stray hounds are worrying state wardens in Upper Michigan. The dogs run deer continually, menacing these animals as much as do the wolves and coyotes, says Boone Howard, Marquette county trapper. The same complaint comes from Montmorency and Cheboygan counties.

ANN ARBOR GRID PROFITS AID GIRLS

What the Athletic Association of the University of Michigan does with the thousands of dollars received annually from foot ball games is a matter of wonder to more than one spectator, gazing about Ferry Field at the solidly packed stands.

Well, the athletic association is called upon to support the wide variety of sports lacking foot ball's appeal and resultant gate receipts, to carry on the university program of physical education, to retire bonds on the vast new stadium and to meet a score of other sizable items of expense. Added to the list is the financing of a $250,000 athletic plant to be used exclusively by the women of the university. For the first time in the history of co-educational institutions, according to the athletic administrators, the earnings of the men have gone to provide quarters for the women in keeping with their needs.

More than $100,000 is to be expended in grading and improving Palmer Field, 1,200 feet long by 350 feet wide and running from East Ann street to what will be a continuation of Forest avenue. Six residences have been purchased to yield additional ground and their removal will be begun at once.

Early next spring ground will be broken for a Women's Field House to cost approximately $150,000 and which it is said will rank with any in the country in point of design and equipment.

UTILITY EXPANSION COSTS 55 MILLION

Fifty-five million dollars in steam turbines, generators, gas machines, retorts, holders, transmission lines, mains, and accompanying equipment will be installed in Michigan by gas and electre companies this year, in preparation for increased service demands, the Michigan Public Utility Information Bureau reports.

The expansion program is being undertaken so the companies will be all ready to serve 70,000 new customers and care for increased needs of those now being served.

The Detroit Edison Company plans call for an outlay of $28,000,000 and the Detroit City Gas Company's approximately $8,000,000. The Consumer's Power Company's system, stretching with its electric lines and gas service over most of the lower peninsula, requires $15,000,000 it is estimated to keep pace with service demands.

CAT WARNS OF FLAMES, 85 FAMILIES RESCUED

A cat played hero when it warned of a fire which threatened 85 families in a Detroit apartment house.

The cat's cries led the Barkley cafe chef to open the basement door. The cat walked into the room in a burst of smoke. Patrolman Harry Stevenson, who was in the restaurant, rushed into the basement. He was overcome by the smoke.

INLAND LAKE FISHERMEN OPPOSE BAN ON SPEAR

Fishermen throughout the Muskegon district are not at all pleased with the order issued by the conservation commission barring the use of the spear in inland lakes and there is talk of a test case out of the first violation. As it is now fishing through the ice can only be carried on by the use of one line held in the hand. For years ice spearing has been practiced during the winter months by numberless fishermen.

NATURE AWAKES DESPITE SNOW

At this leafless season, we are quite inclined to think of Mother Nature as resting, waiting for King Winter to cease his relentless warfare.

Even though most vegetation appears to be dead, however, the ever vigilant Mother Nature is not neglecting her duties.

She aided her trees last summer to form winter buds which contain next year's green leaf shoots and flowers in miniature. If the branches are examined, one finds these buds being held in readiness for next spring's awakening.

This mother does not confine her assistance to the tree family alone. When one glances at the dried remains of a thistle plant as it peers above the snow, one would scarcely believe that at the base of this apparently deal foliage, around the stalk next to the ground, is nestled next year's thistle plant, already green and in the form of a beautiful flat rosette of leaves.

Here, Mother Nature will keep this tiny plant tucked where it can remain green and gradually grow, unmolested by the mischievious fingers of Jack Frost. Then, when the first warm days of spring appear, melting away the blanket of snow, the miniature plant will rejoice in its opportunity to stretch upward and outward at will.

The dried thistle stalk is not the only guide to a green fully formed plant at its base. Moth mullein, the pepper grass, the evening primrose, the willow herb or fireweed, and the rib plantain all take advantage of this same opportunity to form their next year's offspring as early as September. Here with their mother's aid and protection, they nourish these children all during the long cold winter months until it is time to burst joyously forth.

This is just one of Mother Nature's efficient schemes to conserve time for her children, saving only part of the development for the spring season.

ALFALFA TRAIN IN WEST WILL START ON APRIL 25

As part of a state wide campaign next spring to increase Michigan's alfalfa acreage, a lime legume dairy train will be operated in Western Michigan by the Pennsylvania Railroad co-operating with Michigan State College and the State Department of Agriculture.

Tentative dates for the train have been set for April 25 to 29. Stops will be made at 12 stations. The itinerary follows: April 25, Ravenna, Rockford and Howard City; April 26, Big Rapids, Reed City and Cadillac; April 27, Lake City and Manton; April 28, Kalkaska and Alba; April 29, Boyne Falls and Levering.

The train will consist of three coaches filled with dairy and crop exhibits, a lecture car and a business car for the train's personnel.

FORT'S TIMBERS BURIED FOR 148 YEARS DUG UP

Palisades of old Fort Shelby dug up in Detroit during the excavation for a trust company building will be placed on permanent exhibit in the new bank.

These palisades were part of an angle in the old gun platform of Fort Lernoult which subsequently became Fort Shelby.

When the timbers were unearthed by the steam shovels they were fairly sound after being buried over 148 years. Cross ties of timber about four inches square bound the palisades together. They were secured to the palisades by oak pins about one inch in diameter and 10 inches long.

A "noiseless cannon" is said to have been invented in Manchuria by a Chinese inventor named Yang Ye Cheng, employed at the Mukden arsenal. This field gun carries at good range for 3.700 meters (2.3 miles) and emits no sound that can be heard for more than 400 feet.

U. S. OFFICER HAS THRILLING TIMES

Kidnapped, ambushed and hi-jacked is the record of Charles Green of Detroit, admittedly the most unlucky man in the United States immigration service.

The latest episode in Green's hectic career was revealed when officers admitted he had been held up by hijackrs and a boatload of liquor which he had captured taken away from him.

Green found the boat abandoned on the shore near Windmill Pointe. He drove the boat under its own power to the lighthouse on the point and called aid. When he landed the boat was met by three armed hi-jackers, who forced him to give them the boat and the load of liquor.

A few minutes later the trio was captured by federal prohibition officers.

About a month ago Green was waylaid on the river front and eight shots fired at him before he could draw his gun or see his assailants.

Last summer the officer was guarding a fleet of confiscated rum boats. He was captured by a band of rummers, stripped of his badge and gun and kidnapped to Canada. The bootleggers took part of the fleet of boats and replaced them in the liquor traffic.

Green, in all three affairs, has been in such a position that he could not get at his gun to defend himself

A delirate instrument has been invented by Professor Harry Price, director of the National Laboratory of Physical Research in London, to establish definitely whether alleged spirits of dead persons do actually speak from space, as is contended by spiritualists at seances. Scientists are eagerly awaiting the first trial of the new machine.

Working together

Through the collective efforts of men, most of the constructive work of this age is done.

The collective effort of the New York Central Lines is represented by some 140,000 investors and 170,000 employees.

And many of those who work for the New York Central are also investors in it, for more than 40 percent of the 64,000 New York Central stockholders are New York Central employees.

Whether as an investor or an employee, or both, identification with the New York Central is evidence of that cooperative spirit upon which rests the greater usefulness of modern industrial enterprise.

Alcohol

In all history there has been no greater hoax than the recent poison alcohol scare. The impression made by New York newspapers at Christmas time was that drinkers died by the score deliberately poisoned by Prohibition enforcement officers, but an official report of the holiday deaths shows but one death in all New York attribute to wood alcohol or any other denaturant. The other alcohol deaths were from quantity—not quality.

Denatured alcohol is not connected with prohibition except that crooks steal it and fools drink it. Old soaks generally for years have died because of their addiction to wood alcohol, hair tonic, horse liniment, vanilla extract, varnish and other emergency liquors when they could not obtain whiskey.

Before America had prohibition the government had a problem on its hands concerning alcohol. The matter was settled by a tax on all alcohol except that used in industry. In order to distinguish the tax free alcohol and prevent crookedness the American government adopted the European method of making industrial alcohol unfit to drink.

Every civilized goverment uses poison in alcohol to protect industry and the governmental income from the ravages of crooks. The United States uses from 4 to 9 per cent of poison. Other countries use from 10 to 30 percent.

Attempts of the cheaper style wet propagandists to blame poison alcohol upon some individual connected with the dry cause show a lack of information which is pitiful or a viciousness akin to Bolshevism

The sentiment in favor of poison in industrial alcohol comes from the manufacturers of America who decline to accept the wet politicians outcry that poison must be taken from industrial alcohol. American manufacturers use denatured alcohol furnished at a low price because it is untaxed. From the very nature of things if industrial alcohol is furnished free from a denaturant or poison the price would be enormously increased because of the unnecessary tax, and there would be an enormous upset all through business.

Those who are behind the present movement to slander the 18th Amendment know they do not tell the truth when they say that the government (which does not do the denaturing) puts poison in alcohol to kill those who drink it.

Shortage of Clover Seed Boosts Alfalfa

Increased use of alfalfa and sweet clover as leguminous crops with which to keep up Michigan soil fertility and balance crop rotations, is being predicted as a result of the great falling off in alsike clover seed importations from Canada during the past year.

Only 131,000 pounds of alsike seed found its way over the border from Canada last year, as against more than five million pounds in 1925. The result is a boosted price for the seed, while red clover seed is found in a parallel shortage.

A general turning to alfalfa on the part of Michigan growers is seen as the solution of the problem by crops men at M. S. C. Sweet Clover, in spite of an increase in seed price, is also seen as a good crop, especially for pasture and green manuring purposes.

"A big stimulus to Michigan's alfalfa and sweet clover acreage is seen in the present seed situation" says H. C. Rather, secretary of the Michigan Crop Improvement Association. "Farmers should be warned, to get their alfalfa and sweet clover seed early, as the shortage of alsike and red clover is likely to result in a last minute rush with higher prices at planting time."

State Farm Rentals Taken Up By Taxes

Money paid out as taxes by the owners of rented farms in Michigan was 52 percent of the net rental received by the owners of these farms in the seven year period 1919-1925 according to a survey recently completed by a member of the economics department of M. S. C.

The survey covered thousands of farms located in 18 counties of the lower peninsula, and shows that the sharpest increase in taxes per acre occurred between 1919 and 1922. Since that time there has been only a slight increase in the amount of taxes paid per acre.

The high percentage of money paid out as taxes, as compared to the money received as rents, is partly due to the decrease in rentals received in the seven year period. This decrease has amounted to approximately 50 percent, upon the farms surveyed.

When considered on an acre basis, a southwestern Michigan county paid the highest tax rate in the State during the seven years, and a north central county paid the lowest rate. A central Michigan county had the lowest. The owners of rented farms in the county which had the lowest rent returns paid out as taxes 71 percent of the amount of money which they received as rents, according to the survey figures.

FATHER KREBS, THUMB MISSIONARY, BURIED

Beloved Priest Founded Parishes in Many Michigan Towns

Nearly 100 priests from Detroit and the surrounding district gathered in SS. Peter & Paul's Cathedral, recently, to pay their final respects to the Rev. Fr. Clements T. B. Krebs, veteran missionary of the Thumb territory, who died following an illness of several weeks.

The Rt. Rev. Joseph C. Plagens, D. D., auxiliary Bishop of Detroit, pontificated the funeral Mass and the sermon was delivered by the Rt. Rev. Msgr. Francis J. Van Antwerp, V. G., whose friendship with the late missionary extended over a period of half a century. Fr. Krebs founded parishes at Gagetown, Port Huron, Reese, Imlay City, North Branch, Clifford, Bad Axe, Ubly, Caseville, Sheridan and Pigeon.

He was born in Westphalia, Germany, in 1851. In 1879 he was ordained, at Sandwich, Ont., by the late Bishop Borgess and for 35 years braved the dangers and discomforts of the then sparsely settled Thumb district. Other services were also held at St. Agatha's church, Gagetown, and the interment was made at Gagetown, the scene of Father Krebs first labors as a priest.

Farm Bureau Legislative News

There are thrilling and busy days at the State House. Capital punishment, control of lobbyists and finance measures are some of the big issues being threshed out by the lawmakers.

Considerable stress is being shown for the passage of the 4c gas tax and the permanent licenses for passenger cars and an annual weight tax for commercial vehicles. The counties of the state will receive an extra $2,000,000 by the passage of this bill for road building.

Rep. Luther E. Hall's bill designed to curb Chicken thieves finally passed the house by one vote. This bill would require all purchasers of poultry to fill out blanks furnished by the Secretary of State giving specified information regarding each transaction. This information would be kept on file by the purchaser and would be available for any Sheriff or other peace officer to aid in the apprehension of Chicken thieves.

A bill to considerably increase the penalty for poultry stealing has been introduced by Rep. Otis Hoff of Marcellus. For larceny of poultry of not to exceed $25 in value the penalty would be imprisonment in the county jail not less than ninety days or more than one year. For stealing poultry in excess of $25 the penalty would be confinement in state prison not less than two years nor more than five years.

One of the big legislative battles now brewing is in connection with the care of tuberculosis patients in Michigan. Two years ago the Legislative appropriated $500,000 for a new State tuberculosis sanatorium and the legislative committee empowered to select the site reported in favor of a location on some property now owned by the State adjoining the University Hospital at Ann Arbor. However, some people seem to get the idea that such an arrangement might lead to the abandonment of the present sanatorium at Howell. They insist that, for some technical reason, the law passed two years ago, providing for the new institution is void and are now sponsoring several appropriation bills to reconstruct the sanatorium at Howell and put it in first class condition. Besides the regular budget bills for the institution at Howell, Rep. Clarence D. Birkholm of Eau Claire has sponsored a special appropriation of $826,500 which among other items, would provide $200,000 for a new children's unit and equipment and $350,000 for a new medical building.

One of the most fundamental measures dealing with this situation is a bill recently introduced by Rep. James T. Upjohn of Kalamazoo which would create a commission to have the supervision and control of the State tuberculosis sanatorium at Howell, the supervison and control of the construction and operation of a State tuberculosis sanatorium at Ann Arbor and any other tuberculosis sanatorium hereafter erected. The bill would definitely re-appropriate the money appriated two years ago for the construction of the new sanatorium which the legislative committee reported should be built at Ann Arbor.

President Calvin Coolidge has not been left in doubt as to the attitude of Michigan farmers regarding the McNary-Haugen farm relief bill passed by Congress and referred to him for his signature. Not only are many farmers writing and wiring their views to the President but telegrams have been sent by state officials urging him to give his approval to the measure.

Governor Fred W. Green in wiring the President called attention to the fact that the McNary-Haugen bill does not involve an untried principle, in that other countries have successfully employed similar plans of surplus control. The Governor's telegram was as follows:

"While I would not intentionally add to your burdens, I feel that you should know that our agricultural interests feel that the McNary Haugen Bill should become a law. Inasmuch as other countries have tried similar plans that have worked out successfully, they feel that the plight of the agricultural interests entitles them to this experiment."

Supplementing this action, Herbert E. Powell, State Commissioner of Agriculture wired President Coolidge as follows:

"We urgently request you to sign the McNary-Haugen Bill. We are sure a large percentage of the agriculturists of Michigan believe this measure should be given a fair trial."

C. L. Brody, Secretary-Manager of the Michigan State Farm Bureau and member of the State Board of Agriculture, sent the following telegram to the President:

"Michigan State Farm Bureau urgently requests you to sign McNary-Haugen Bill. Measure approved just recently by delegates from nearly all counties of Michigan. Our thousands of members will greatly appreciate your favorable consideration."

PINEAPPLE BRINGS PROGRESS TO HAWAII

VISITORS to Hawaii are sometimes surprised to find instead of grass huts, ovens built in the ground, beautiful American homes, cosmopolitan cuisines and pineapple plantations which are among the most modern of any plantations in the world.

They are apt to forget that although the islands of Hawaii have been civilized only a comparatively short time as civilization goes, during that time they have been civilized at high pressure. Owing to the magic of Hawaiian climate and natural beauty, they have quickly become one of the most cosmopolitan spots of the world.

It is this curious mixture of the old and the new which makes Hawaii so interesting.

Yesterday the little girl who sat before her grass hut knew only the art of mat-weaving or lauhala hat making. In the long Hawaiian evenings she sat inside her hut listening to the legends of the Fire-gods told by the old folks as they sat mending their nets for the next day's catch. She could swim and dive, shinny a cocoanut tree and drop down the big nuts whose milk was so cooling even under tropical suns; and she could go "torch fishing" with the men who waded deep out at sea with torch and spear to catch the squib and eel.

Today she sits on the lanai, or veranda, and reads, or chats in very good English with friends, over Kona coffee, Hawaiian pastry, pineapple jam or poha jelly. She still loves adventure. Often in the evenings she goes down to the big American hotels and enjoys the jazz music, even though it is so different from the wailing melodies of her people. For adventurous sport she chooses surf riding—dashing into the shore at the rate of 25 or 30 miles an hour, erect and poised on a bit of board driven by breakers.

Most of the changes in the manner of social life in Hawaii have come in the last 25 years, and much of it can be traced to the time when Hawaii was found to be the ideal spot for pineapple plantations and the biggest ones in the world began to be established there.

With the pineapple plantations came the opportunity for natives to find abundant work in the fields—out-of-door work in the land they loved best. Higher wages than they had ever before received enabled them to think of things outside the little banana and taro patch at home.

Schools were built and with education came the desire for better homes. Slowly the little grass huts gave way to small cottages. These cottages grew in size as the workers became more prosperous and many who became rich in the industry built homes which are now pointed out to sightseers of the Paradise Islands.

Women were employed in the new pineapple canneries and ideals of cleanliness instilled into them which were carried to the home. They enjoyed wearing the snowy white caps and aprons which were the uniforms supplied to workers in the factories, and with the rubber gloves policy of pineapple canneries which prohibits human hands ever touching the fruit, came a new idea of sanitary methods of cooking.

Warm meals served the workers at noon in the pineapple canneries introduced into Hawaii some new dishes which the women found lent variety to their rather limited diet of "poi," which is Hawaiian bread made from the taro root, fish, cooked bananas and raw pineapples. They learned among other things something of the dietetic benefit of the canned pineapple which they were producing and up in the big cafeteria, they sampled new ways of serving it

With employment for women in the canneries came day nurseries for children. These nurseries were equipped with the best gymnasiums and playgrounds for children. Clinics were introduced so that "better babies" as well as "better pineapples" could be grown in Hawaii. Trained kindergartners were hired to teach the kiddies organized play, and dietitians taught the mothers what foods their children should eat.

Hawaiians began to take a keen interest in the big pineapple plantations which afforded them a better living, and they took a greater pride in making them the best fields and canneries found anywhere in the world.

Climate brought wealthy visitors from everywhere to enjoy the glory of Hawaiian sunshine and the magic of Hawaiian moonlight. Hotels with their entertainment brought over to Hawaii the gaiety and life that Hawaiians love.

An annual pageant commemorates the Hawaii that used to be. Great luaus, feasts, are held, food is cooked in underground ovens, and visitors are treated to a taste of the Hawaiian bread, made from taro root. Strains of Hawaiian music float out through the palm trees and graceful hula dancers with leis of woven flowers toss these tokens to newcomers to the Paradise of the Pacific, who wish for a glimpse of the Hawaii of yesterday.

"But of the laws that govern the propagation of electro-magnetic waves over the earth and through the air we know little. In this field we encounter a bewildering haze of theory. Much further scientific investigation is required before the problems will be solved.

"We know that with the same given power at the transmitting station we can cover greater distance over salt water than we can over land; we can in general cover greater distance over flat land than over hilly country, over moist land than dry land. We have noted the absorption of wave energy by mineral deposits in the earth. We are just beginning to glimpse the possibilities of short wave transmission—that is, transmission with wave lengths of 100 meters or less. We find, in some instances, that reception is good at a point 2,000 miles from the transmitter and very poor at a distance of 200 miles. We are able to cover extraordinary ranges with low power short-wave transmission, but often are unable to communicate over comparatively short distances. But the fact remains that our understanding of the physical phenomena involved has made comparatively little advance over the theories formulated by Faraday and Maxwell."

Three Basic Technical Problems

"The great technical problems of radio communication are static, interference, and fading. We have discovered many palliatives for these ills but no cures.

(a) Static

"The proposed solutions of the problem presented by static, as Dr. E. F. W. Alexanderson so ably points out, have been dominated by two working theories. One is that static is a disturbance in the atmosphere, different in its electrical nature from a radio signal. The second theory is that the disturbing waves resemble the signal but come from all directions, while the signal itself comes from only one direction. Under the first theory we have attempted to filter out the static electrically, but we find that we often leave a residue of signal almost too weak for usefulness. The Radio Corporation of America has been much more successful in its application of the second theory, whereby a system of reception is used that responds selectively to the waves from one direction and excludes those from other directions.

(b) Interference

"Beyond the highly-selective methods of reception already adopted, one of the greatest hopes of solving the problem of interference, that jumble of transmission between signals from different stations, lies in the further exploration of short wave transmission. Short wave lengths promise to open up not only new paths for wave propagation, but a large number of useful communication channels. Consider that almost all the long-wave transoceanic telegraph station in the world are crowded into a frequency band about 15,000 cycles wide, whereas the available short-wave field below 100 meters includes approximately 30,000,000 cycles, and you will have some indication what the future may bring forth in the way of additional radio communication facilities.

(c) Fading

"Of the mysteries of 'fading,' that largely inexplicable diminution of signal strength, we know only that there are three kinds: First, is the great variation between daylight and night reception; second, is the sharp decrease of signal strength which is usually observed around sunrise and sunset; and, third, is the sudden variation of signal strength in broadcasting, when a sharp rise or a sharp drop may be noted of two or three seconds or even of many minutes' duration, down to periods so short that the variation becomes an audible frequency modulation which distorts the signal."

"One might almost wonder at the self-restraint of modern science in leaving so much to be discovered by the generations of future scientists. In our investigations of the behavior of electro-magnetic waves, we seem to be trembling on the edge of many fundamental facts. Light itself, as Professor Pupin and other great authorities have shown us, is an electro-magnetic phenomenon, and the electrons that compose every atom in the blazing sun are each busy though tiny broadcasting stations, sending their messages in all directions.

"A more exact knowledge of the possible transformations of light waves and electro-magnetic waves would bring the day nearer when the transmission of sight by radio would be as common as the transmission of sound. We have cleared much of the ground in this connection. We have already demonstrated the possibility of the wireless transmission of images over great distances. Photographs of current events sent by radio to and from London have been published within a few hours by the newspapers of the two cities. We have transmitted photographs by wireless across the American continent, from Honolulu to New York, and this development continues.

"More fundamental discoveries with regard to the handling of light waves and electro-magnetic waves must be made before television, the art of transmitting instantaneously changing scenes and moving objects, can be considered an accomplished fact. The vista which such a period of radio transmission would open up, especially in the realm of higher education, is inspiring indeed. To the power of exposition now inherent in sound broadcasting would be added the power of demonstration made possible by the broadcasting of sight."

RADIO DEVELOPMENT A BOON TO MOTION PICTURE ART

"In one respect at least this problem has been solved in our electrical laboratories, that is, in the synchronizing of sound and sight. It is no longer disclosing a laboratory secret to announce that the Radio Corporation of America will soon demonstrate publicly a method of speech and musical synchronizing particularly adapted to the motion picture art and using the latest principles of sound reproduction developed for radio."

New Relationships Created

"From whatever angle radio is viewed, the great opportunities are before, not behind. Radio has created a multitude of new problems, which cry to be led out of the wilderness.

"Let us consider, for example, the problem of regulation, and the definition of radio rights in the air. These are entirely virgin subjects in law. One of the basic problems to be solved is the ownership of the air space above the land and water. Shall we heed or cast aside the ancient maxim, 'That he who owns land owns it to the heavens above and to the center of the earth, from the zenith to the nadir?' To uphold this maxim would be to prohibit aerial navigation for, as an authority points out, every flight would constitute innumerable, actionable trespasses. Radio is a greater trespasser than the flying machine. No bars or windows can completely keep out electro-magnetic waves; radio broadcasting enters into every home.

"And yet this ancient maxim, adopted by the courts of England centuries ago, has the endorsement of such eminent authorities as Coke and Blackstone, for at that time the upper air space was not utilized. Under this maxim of law it has been held to be a trespass to thrust one's arm into the space over a neighbor's land."

A Great Force in Education

"The fact that broadcasting is essentially a system of mass communication has somewhat obscured the great potentialities of radio as an instrument of education. It is true that any universal system of broadcasting must be governed largely by majority demand, and the demand for entertainment in broadcasting is much greater than the demand for education.

"Nevertheless the fact remains that education is the highest purpose which broadcasting can serve. Radio offers to the educator an auditorium many times greater than the combined capacity of every college auditorium in the country. When radio can add sight to sound, demonstration to exposition, it will be able more closely to project the work of the university classroom.

"At present the educational world still faces the task of devising a system of popular education suitable for transmission over a universal broadcasting system. The greater opportunity will come when specialized broadcasting systems are made possible by the opening of additional channels in the air, and sight is added to sound in radio transmission.

"Radio is now losing the bloom of romance that characterizes the early beginnings of every new art. It is taking on the firm outline of an established art and a flourishing industry. As such it beckons to the scientist, to the artist, to the educator and to the business man, to come forward and contribute to the progress of mankind."

Roberta Risks It

CHAPTER FIFTY

In her purse Roberta found a sum sufficient for her need—Peter's money but it should be used in Peter's cause. Her exalted sacrificial mood absorbed her to the exclusion of minor considerations, and the possibility of leaving a note explaining her departure did not occur to hed. Her mind was focused upon ways and means—intent upon saving Celia from her father, Janet from Peter's reproaches for having betrayed his plight, and Peter from the results of his nobility.

Softly she slipped out of the black dress and into the brown one, blew out her candle, and stole in stocking feet down through the dark house to the kitchen door.

There she put on her brown shoes and let herself out silently. The stars were bright, but the moon had not dense shadow, mindful of the detecdence shadow, mindful of the detective in the lane, until she gained the fence at the back of the property, over which she clambered into the woodland beyond. Slowly and stealthily, crouching behind the fence, she felt her way along to the cleared pasture which ran back almost to the road where Piggy and his father had seradated. Still making as little noise as possible she wormed her way through the short stretch of woods between pasture and thoroughfare, pushing aside the underbrush, detained and scratched by briars, and at last found herself on the highway.

Thence she walked quietly, keeping in shadow when she could, to Fitzwilliam Depot, where, toward dawn, a through train from Montreal to Boston was flagged and siting in a Pullman section she slept a little.

Long before Piggy left his room, to chafe because she did not come downstairs, she had located his father, having taken a cab at the station and started on a round of Boston hotels. Finding Grover Brazenose registered at the second one she visited, she dismissed the cab and sat down near the elevator to wait.

About eight o'clock he stepped from one of the cages and she recognized him instantly, for his unsentimental son carried in his pocketbook a photograph which more than once had been proudly displayed to her.

Brazenose went to the newsstand for a paper and then to the dining room, and the astute Roberta, reflecting that a man's better nature is rarely in the ascendant before breakfast, followed, choosing the table next his and a seat facing him. He looked pretty savage, but she was glad to see that he ordered a good meal. While he ate it, reading his paper at the same time, she studied him surreptiously and outlined her mode of atatck. Leaving the dining room just before he did, she was waiting at the door when he came out.

"You're Mr. Brazenose, aren't you?" she asked.

"I am." He looked down at her in surprise. Age had not withered nor anger staled his appreciation of an attractive woman, and this one's beauty was refined by indications of brains.

"I'm Roberta Scott. I want to talk to you, please.

"You have nothing to say that I care to hear, Miss Scott." His quick mind leaped to the conclusion that, inasmuch as they had never met before, some one must have told her who he was, and his eyes searched the offing for his recusant and possibly recanting son.

"How do you know?" she retorted. "I stayed up all night to get her in time to see you.' This fact was attested by her pallor and the deep circles beneath her dark eyes. "You're not going to be unfair and refuse to hear me, are you?"

"I know what you've come for, and I prefer not to discuss it with you—or with anybody else," he replied, as curtly as a man of his inherent courtesy could bring himself to speak to any woman. But his eyes still searched and Roberta saw.

"I'm alone, Mr. Brazenose," she said softly. "Peter doesn't know I'm here."

"Peter?"

"That's what I call your son. He wouldn't have let me come, if he'd known. I ran away—in the middle of the night—because I had to see you."

"Then how did you recognize me?" he demanded, doubting her.

"By a photograph Peter carried in his pocket." Brazenose flushed and grunted. "Will you come into the parlor, please? It's rather public here."

Reluctantly he followed her into a large, quiet room where they were alone, but he did not suggest her sitting down. He could not be rude to a woman, but he wanted the thing over.

"Well?"

"I haven't seen Peter—not to speak to him—since you were there yesterday, but I know what happened. Janet told me.' And I saw his face. Do you know how he feels about you?"

"I know what he did."

"I know how he feels, because he's told me. He didn't say it this way—he wouldn't, you know—but I could see. He knows you've been his father and brother and pal——"

"Stop it!" Brazenose interrupted sharply. "Talk's cheap. It's action that counts. Don't try to be sentimental."

"All right, let's be practical," said Roberta, perceiving that her first shot had pierced the skin. "Because he befriended me—and my sister—you've disowned him."

"I disowned him because he's disloyal."

"He is not! He didn't know until you told him yesterday that my father had threatened your business."

The man caught at what he took to be an opportunity to terminate the interview, replying stiffly: "You'll really have to excuse me, Miss Scott. I can't discuss your father with you."

"Oh, yes, you can! I know my father, Mr. Brazenose. Because he is my father, I can't discuss him with most persons, but I can with you. I must, because he's responsible for all this trouble. If he hadn't been cruel to my sister——"

"Nonsense! Scott has his faults, like the rest of us, but he isn't cruel to his family."

"You know what happens to a thoroughbred horse when his spirit is broken, don't you? Would you call deliberately setting out to break the spirit of a sensitive seventeen-year-old girl cruel?"

"He may have objected to a silly love affair—I understand that was the case—and used some legitimate authority——"

Roberta continued steadily. "Would you call it cruel to keep her locked in her stateroom all the way across the Atlantic, and isolated for months in the country, watched day and night and never permitted a moment alone? Is it cruel to spread a report among the servants and in Keene that all this is because her mind is affected? Do you think it's cruel to tell a girl of that age that she'll be declared mentally incompetent and sent to a sanitarium unless she solemnly promises to do exactly as her father says about everything?"

Brazenose looked into her clear, truthful eyes and wavered.

"Did Scott do that?"

"He did. He told her that the only way she could prove that she was not insane fas to abey him absolutely. Do you think it was cruel to refuse a scientific education to a daughter who wanted it more than anything in the world, to compel her to associate only with persons he selected, whom she didn't like, and to try to force her to marry a man she didn't love? I've never told anyone before, but that's what he did to me. And because I wouldn't submit, I was disowned."

"I wouldn't have believed it of him," Brazenose murmured, aghast, but no longer doubting. Against his will, he was beginning to admire this frank, fearless, straightforward girl.

CHAPTER FIFTY-ONE

"Until I met my sister on the sly in London," said Roberta, "I hadn't seen or heard from any member of my family for over two years, and my only offense was that I wouldn't be broken to his will. That's the reason I was so determined to get Celia away, when I found he was trying to break her, too. The love affair doesn't matter—she's too young. But she matters very much to me. And the case was desperate. She was almost broken when we got her away."

"You could have done that legally."

"I know—now. But I didn't know it then. I'm going to see a lawyer before I go back—perhaps you can recommend one here?—and find out just what to do. Then I'm going to do it. Peter won't be mixed up in it at all. So—you'll take him back, won't you?"

At the mention of his son, Brazenose's face had hardened again. He shook his head.

"But why? My—father—nobody will ever know."

"No."

"Won't you tell me why?"

"He knows why. It's not a matter I can discuss with you."

"I know him very well now. Is it because he's generous and chivalrous and——"

"Chivalrous! Tcha! He's a romantic fool, and danger's the breath of his nostrils. No sense of responsibility, no loyalty to me or the business."

"Ah, the business," said Roberta. At last they had arrived at the crux of the matter. "You care a lot for your business, Mr. Brazenose."

"That's more than he does. All he thinks of is sport."

"It isn't."

"Mine is. I've been in business two years myself, and it's the most fascinating game I ever played."

"It may amuse you," he said, with scant regard for a woman's small affairs. "But real business is serious. It takes all there is in a man."

"I know. But you have all the money you need, haven't you?" she inquired with innocent eyes. "Do you need to work so hard for more? For yourself and Peter, I mean?"

"No, no! It's not that. It's for the business!"

"For the game!" she cried triumphantly, and continued regardless of his attempts to speak: "Don't you see? You play it hard, with all there is in you, but it's the game you care for. Getting the most out of your cards—watching the other man's play and guessing at what he has in reserve—establishing your suit—using your power—piling up points—winning! You don't care for the stakes yourself. You put them all back on the table and go on playing—all day, all night, year in and year out, the game, that's your sport!"

Brazenose smiled wryly, but his eye did not soften. "It's more than that."

"What, then?"

"Production. Making a good thing and making it as well as it can be made. Suppling other men's needs better than anybody else can supply them. Putting something into the world that wasn't there before, and that will stay and grow long after I'm gone. Constantly raising the standard and trying to reach it. Establishing a reputation and carrying beyond it. Production."

Roberta's eyes kindled in recognition of a high ideal.

"And you'd shut your only son out of that?"

"He shut himself out."

"No!" she cried, and now her eyes flashed and color rose in her cheeks. "He couldn't shut himself out, because you never let him in. Have you ever given him an opportunity to solve a problem? Have you ever used his wonderful imagination, called upon his resources, let him play any real part in your game? You have not! Oh, I know what his work has been. He's told me, and he didn't complain about it, either. You've kept him sitting at a desk answering unimportant letters, meeting unimportant men whom you were too busy to bother with, keeping track of fusty acounts fussing over petty little routine details. And because he had to have some outlet for his powers that you wouldn't give him, you're disinheriting him!"

"Don't you see what you're throwing away? Don't you see what he spends on his own games that he's give to yours if you'd let him? Don't you see what a marvelously ingenious imagination he has? What splendid courage, what infinite resource, what unbreakable loyalty to his purpose—and his word? Do you think he can have all that seething in him and smother it, while he learns the business from the bottom up, as you tell him he ought to? Don't you see that if he had something to do at the top, he'd find out about the bottom himself, because he'll never do anything unless he does it well? Don't you know there's no possibility he doesn't see, no danger he doesn't prepare for? Don't you understand what possibilities he has—what he's bound to become, with or without your help? Are you going to throw all that away, for yourself and your business? Don't you recognize genius when you see it—just because you live with it?"

"In love with him, are you?" said Brazenose dryly.

The color faded from Roberta's face, leaving it pale again.

"You are unjust, then," she sair, with weary scorn. "You see only personally. I expect to be married within a few days, Mr. Brazenose—not to your son."

"Then P. G. is a bigger fool than I took him for," was the blunt reply.

Presently he went on, still sore and wrathful, hungering for the boy he had banished from his life and hurt by his defection, but curiously desiring to justify himself and his position in the eyes of this young woman.

"He may be all that you say, but the fact remains that I explained the situation fully to him yesterday—and it's a very serious one for us. I showed him exactly where he stood in relation to it, exactly what depended upon his decision—it was a question of loyalty—and he made his choice. Now he must abide by it."

Roberta's heart sank, empty of hope. She looked at him reflectively.

"It's true, then," she said. "I read somewhere the other day that men consider property and women consider life. I knew my father was like that, but—you are, too."

"What?" Aside from the fact that the epigram had caught his attention, precipitating into word crystals certain ideas set floating in vague solution through his mind, by her impassioned argument—ideas new to him, because for years he had given real thought to but one subject—Brazenose did not relish being classed with Scott, especially by Scott's gallant daughter, "Say that again."

"Men consider property and women consider life. It's true."

Te stared at her a moment. "I'll be damned if it is! Here sit down." He pushed a chair toward her. "Let's talk that out. What do you mean?"

Trains between Boston and Jaffrey are limited in number, and Roberta passionately desired to relieve Percival Galahad Brazenose of all responsibility for herself and her sister at the earliest possible moment. Therefore, having borrowed additional money from a friend, she hired an automobile to take her to her father's house and told the driver to make haste.

As she drove unveiled through the quaint old village, pedestrians stared, recognizing the prodigal daughter, and keen eyes peering through small paned windows goggled. "Good land! Roberta Scott's back!" the word ran around. "D'you 'spose they sent for her?" Housewives left afternoon tasks unfinished, hurrying to inform the neighbors, and shopkeepers peddled the news to one another and to their customers, trading more largely in conjecture than in merchandise.

Just before her car reached Birchwood fork Roberta saw Clifford Nixon trudging into view, the furlrow that had now become habitual between his brows deepened by a painful interview with Scott.

"Stop. I want to speak to that man," she said to the driver.

"Roberta! My dear girl!" Nixon exclaimed, with infinite relief, but with perceptible exasperation, also.

"Where on earth have you bene?"

"I've been in the country, Clif, so I didn't see any papers until this morning," she replied, with a warning glance toward the driver.

"Where's Celia?"

"She's safe—with me."

"I knew it! You've got to bring her back."

"Have I?" Her glance held something of surprise and more mockery.

He opened the door of the tonneau, putting a foot on the step, but she becked him with outflung hand.

"Not now, Clif. I'll see you tomorrow."

"You'll see me now," he returned doggedly, the lover in him temporankious victim. Steppnig into the car, he placed himself beside her. "You don't understand what this means, or you wouldn't have done it."

She made a little gesture toward the driver. "This is hardly the place for explanations, is it?"

"I can't help that. I didn't create this situation. In fact, I specifically warned you against it." His tone was bitter. "You got my message?"

She nodded.

"An acquaintance of mine."

Nixon resolved to make more searching inquiries later; just now important matters pressed. "Where are you going?"

"To see my father."

"I'll go with you. Drive on," he told the man.

"No, wait," Roberta countermanded. "You can't go with me, Clif, I must see him alone."

"But you don't understand,' he persisted. "He knows about—you and me. He found out somehow that you were coming, and accused me of being in New York to meet you. So I told him, like a fool, that we were to be married. Now nothing will convince him that I didn't have a hand in Celia's disappearance. I was here—looking for you."

"Yes, I heard you were here." A gleam of mirth shone in her eyes "And of course I knew why."

"But you don't know! He owns a lot of stock in my company—has all the time, I find. That's the reason I didn't meet you. He manipulated things so I had to go back to Cleveland that very morning, or lose some important patents." He looked at her anxiously and she nodded.

"I thought it was something like that."

"Now I can't make him listen to reason. About Celia, I mean. It's a case of proving myself innocent, and because I can't do it he's going to ruin me—ruin me utterly! He told me so ten minutes ago."

"Really?" She gave him an ironic glance, remembering the attitude of one Percival Galahad in similar stress. "I don't think he will, Clif."

"He will. Nothing can stop him now, unless—you've got to bring Celia back, that's all! And get it over to him somehow that I had nothing to do with taking her away."

"I'll do that—convince him, I mean."

"And brink Celia back?"

"Never!"

"You must! Look her, dear girl, be reasonable. This thing has got past the romantic stage. He won't hurt Celia——"

"No, he won't."

"—but unless I'm cleared of all responsibility for any of this fool performance, I stand to lose everything I have in the world."

"Love in a cottage and the world well lost doesn't seem to appeal to you, Clif."

"Not for you. And it's all for you." He fell back upon the ancient masculine plea. "Don't you see that I'll have nothing to offer you—nothing—unless I get out of this? It's for your sake I care most—for us!"

Roberta smiled dryly. "You missed your cue, Clif. That was a little late. Don't worry, though; you won't lose. I've come to straighten it all out."

"How?"

"Never mind now. Tomorrow you shall hear all you need to know."

"But, I tell you he knows all about us, and that's made him suspicious. Unless you prove absolutely that I had nothing to do with it——"

"I will."

"You'll have to tell him who did help you. Somebody must have."

"Somebody did."

"Who was it?"

"A man who didn't count the cost, Clif. I've got to consider him, too. Now please get out."

"Where's Celia?"

"Celia's where you'll never find her so you and father might as well stop persecuting that poor woman over at Fitzwilliam. The papers say you've made her life a burden. Every minute counts, you know," she suggested, when he sat morosely looking at her. "Father may be sending telegrams now to blow up your factory. You'd better get out and let me go to the rescue."

Nixon got out, pausing with his hand on the door to say, "I'll wait here until you come back."

"Not if you want to see me afterward," she advised. "You're not exactly a heroic figure, Clif, and you've rather rubbed it in today. But I dar say you have your points. If I don't see you again until tomorrow night, in New York, perhaps I'll remember what they are."

She gave him the name of a hotel where she could be found the next evening and drove on, leaving him standing in the road, perplexed and discomfited.

Stopped by the locked gate, Roberta explained her errand to the gardner and was admitted. At the door she said to the maid:

"I'm Miss Scott. Please tell my father I'm here. No, I'll not come in. Say that I'm waiting on the terrace."

Scott, listening in the living room, appeared behind the maid, his face purple. "Go back to the kitchen," he commanded the woman; then, to Roberta, "Come in here."

"No. You've forbidden me your house and I won't enter it now." Well coached, she used this pretext to insure against witnesses to what she had to say. "I'll talk to you outside."

In a mood unusually bellicose even for him, her parent glared. "Are you telling me what to do and where to go—on my own premises?"

"That's one reason why I won't go into the house," she replied calmly. "I have come to tell you what to do, and what I'm prepared to do, about Celia."

"You can't make terms with me. Where is she?"

"Are you ready to meet the alternative?"

"What alternative?"

"A legal alternative—that you would not like. You wouldn't care to have mother and the servants know about it, either, so that's another reason for not talking in the house. Will you come?"

WISCONSIN FARMER SELLS OLD MACHINERY TO FORD

Wisconsin has provided a historical farm machine for Henry Ford's collection of "early Americana."

Nearly 50 years ago, when the manufacturer was a resident of Greenfield, Michigan, his birthplace, his father, William Ford, owned a Nichol & Shepard steam engine, a traction machine that was the pride of the Ford family as well as the whole country side.

Today Henry Ford has a steam engine of the same make. He has purchased it from Fred Ingwerson, a Portage county farmer, and it has been shipped to Dearborn to be placed along with other relics that typify America's history and growth.

MANY ENTER COURSE BY MAIL AT STATE COLLEGE

Rural and urban residents in all parts of Michigan are enrolling in the credit and non-credit correspondence courses which were established at the Michigan State college at the beginning of this year, according to Prof. John D. Willard, director of continuing education.

The enrollment is not large, as it is not generally known that the courses in agriculture, sociology and economics are available at the institution. Each course consists of ten to twelve assignments, and the test books are virtually the same as those used by the resident students at the college.

BAY CITY LIKELY OUT OF LEAGUE

The chance of Bay City entering the Michigan Base Ball League again this year, if one is formed, were given a serious set back when Bob Prysock, manager of the pennant winning team of 1926, signed to pilot the Wheeling, W. Va., club of the Mid-Atlantic league.

The Bay City club owners are not enthusiastic, despite the fact that the city has had organized base ball continuously since 1919 and has won three pennants. The fact that the club directors gave Prysock permission to sign the Wheeling contract makes it evident they do not plan further operations.

Prysock came to the Wolves at the outset of the 1923 season and played under Charles E. (Punch) Knoll. During the 1923 and 1924 seasons he aided in bringing two Mint League pennants to Bay City. He retained his job as second baseman in the lean 1925 season under Dick Breen's management, and early in 1926 when Breen accepted a job as business manager of the St. Joseph (Mo.) team of the Western league, Physock was appointed boss.

It was his fourteenth year in organized base ball, but his first shot at the managerial toga. He had a poor start in the four club Mint circuit, but the amalgamation of the Mint and Central leagues brought about a reawakened interest in the club. The Wolves jumped into first place in the last week of June and held first position throughout the remainder of the season.

The Bay City club which Prysock led to the championship last year has fallen apart. Two of the most reliable performers, "Sep" Good, a former Detroit Tiger pitcher, and Al Bashang, fleet footed out fielder, have signed to play elsewhere next summer. Good will be with Houston in the Texas league and Bashang with Wilkes-Barre in the Pennsylvania-New York circuit. Both were free agents when the 1926 Michigan league campaign closed.

Andy Wally, third sacker, and Roy Curtin, an outfielder, were sold to Beaumont, Texas. Ollie Menard was sold to Rochester, N. Y., and later to Providence, R. I., where he will start the next season. Prysock, who played second, will be missing and "Doc" Weber, first baseman, has informed club owners that he will not return another year.

STATE SEEKS DEER YARD UPPER PENINSULA SITES

A canvass of the available sites for deer yards in the Upper Peninsula will be undertaken by the game refuge division of the conservation commission. If possible some of these sites will be purchased outright by the state for permanent preservation; others will be leased from the owners with the understanding that the timber growth is not to be removed during the life of the lease.

OSCEOLA CHANGES LAW TO SPEER VOTING INTEREST

To increase interest in elections and get out more voters in the district, Osceola township officials changed the township voting law by allowing twice as many delegates to take part in all township conventions in the future.

MICHIGAN GROWS AS EXPORT FACTOR

The state of Michigan is fast increasing in prominence as a contributing factor in the world's commerce, according to Howard H. Tewksbury, Detroit manager of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

Tewksbury sets forth statistical figures showing Michigan's growth as an exporter and importer, and gives some of the reasons why the increase is not even greater than shown.

The Michigan customs district, which was created with the consolidation of the four districts of the state in 1914, and which includes the ports of Detroit, Port Huron, Saulte St. Marie and three or four others. Tewksbury says that Michigan now ranks fifth among the exporting states of the country. Although the figures for the month of December, 1926, are not yet available, commodities exported during the first 11 months of the year totaled $252,711,278 as against $231,730,177 for the same period of the previous year, or a gain of nine per cent. Exports for the first 11 months of 1926, he says, were nearly $500,000 more than the total exports for the full 12 months of 1925.

When considering Michigan exports, the writer points out, it must be remembered that many products of Michigan origin are shipped to foreign countries through ports in other customs districts and are not included in exports clearing through Michigan ports. In a similar manner, he says, products of other states are exported through Michigan ports, but commencing in January, 1924, the department of commerce has compiled figures based primarily on through bills of lading, and this method gives a fair indicaton of how much is exported from the various states.

"The general business depression in England, and the disposition of certain other European countries to curtail their imports in order to bring about a less unfavorable balance of trade," Tewksbury says, "are factors temporarily tending to cut down the world commerce. But with the prosperity and progress in South America, the East Indian region, Canada, and various other parts of the world, the total world trade held up fairly well in 1926, and our share of it—at least so far as concerns manufactured commodities—was more than maintained.'

Concrete evidence of what the state of Michigan contributes to the total automotive shipments from the United States is disclosed in the statement that 65 per cent of the nation's total originates in the Wolverine state. The total from the country, during the first nine months of 1926, the writer states, was $168,692,474, of which amount Michigan shipped $108,000,000. The principle that a large portion of Michigan products are exported from other states, holds particularly true in automobile exports, the article says. It is estimated, however, that 80 or 85 per cent of the automotive products produced in the United States originate in Michigan.

The figures given as automotive shipments, Tewksbury says, are exclusive of automobile parts exported for assembly abroad.

Other Michigan products finding foreign markets and trailing the automobile in industrial importance, are adding machines, medicinal and pharmaceutical preparations, agricultural implements, machinery and foodstuffs. A substantial increase in the exportation of all of these articles may be expected when statistical figures for the complete year are available.

TRAINS DAILY WAR IS AGAINST SNOW

Every day the train running on the Leelanau county branch of the Manistee & North Eastern Railroad bravely leaves the station at Traverse City and, if the snow drifts are not too high, arrives in Provemont at 11:24. The conductor, Charles Decker, who has spent the last 31 years on this road, and L. A. Mann, the engineer, with 37 years of service to his credit, have dinner and, if the snow is not too bad, get back to Traverse City by 12:55, just in time, in fact, to leave again on the Northport branch at 1:35 p. m., on the chance that they may reach their destination by 3:03 p. m. The two lines—the latter co-operatively owned by the farmers of Leelanau county—share the same train crew and rolling stock.

The snowplow is in constant use from about December 1 to the latter end of March, and sometimes considerably later. The modest 55 miles of railroad, the one branch running 26 miles to Provemont, and the other 29 miles to Northport, are this Michigan county's only rail outlets to the world that lies south of Traverse City.

To get to the county seat at Leland one goes by train to Provemont and the rest of the journey by stage To go farther than Leland in the prevailing weather one walks or hires what is known as a "caboose"—really a covered wagon built on a sled—or gets one of the doctors in the county to make room on the front seat of his snowmobile.

LEAFLESS TREES GIVE FINE VIEW TO STUDY BIRDNESTS

The best time to observe birds' nests is in the winter when the leaves are off the trees and nature reveals her secrets of the past season, says Jack Van Coevering of Grand Rapids.

A hike along a lake shore or a stream will reveal a score of nests, each telling its own story, and challenging you to guess what kind of a bird lived in it. If the weather is cold, small streams often offer interesting fields of exploration, since the water is frozen solid, and one can walk in the middle of the creek and inspect both banks to his own content.

The seed pods of the asters and the goldenrod have released their burdens leaving only their silky linings exposed to the wind. The shrubs that grow among the bank are brown and vines which entwine them are stripped of all foliage. Only the bright red berries of the nightshade and the bittersweet hang like drooping pendants or rubies against a glittering background of snow. Here and there you will see small masses of weeds or twigs, capped with an inch of snow; these are the birds' nests.

18 BILLION YEAR COST OF AUTOS

American motorists are participating in one of the greatest financial enterprises the world ever has experienced. Figured conservatorily on the basis of exact reports and authoritative estimates, the people of the United States spent at least $18,000,000,000 last year for automobiles and for the privilege of driving them.

What the actual value of this great industry may be, on the strength of this expenditure, would bring the figures so high that they would sound fantastic. The total would include amount of capital invested in automobile, parts, tires and related industries, capital put into garage dealers' and distributors' businesses, money already spent for highways and for machinery used in building more highways, and it would cover a rapidly increasing investment in the business of motor bus transportation.

For one year's expenditures alone, the total is dizzy enough. Here are the 1926 estimates:

Auto output	$3,056,950,000
Tire output	970,000,000
Parts output	655,000,000
Service	910,000,000
Busses	500,000,000
Freight	150,000,000
Taxes	735,000,000
Maintenance	10,000,000,000
Highways	1,000,000,000

This makes a total of $17,976,950,000, which is the amount spent during 1926 and in this country alone.

$10,000,000 FARM INCOME IN GRAND TRAVERSE AREA

Agriculture in the Grand Traverse region in 1926 was a $10,000,000 industry, according to a survey just completed by L. F. Perkett, produce dealer.

The report shows that the region's income from cherries last year exceeded $1,000,000. Other commodities returned the following sums: Butter fat, $2,713,000; potatoes, $2,435,000; apples, $468,400; grain, $200 000; beans, $158,000; seed peas, $61,000; radish seed, $65,000; small fruits, $300,000; cattle, $725,000; hogs, $600,000; poultry, $225,000; eggs, $560,000.

How Do You Like My Frock?

That question above might well be asked by Miss Billie Dove, the beautiful screen star, who is pictured here wearing a charming street frock of attractive design. It's a one-piece dress of black crepe romane and has an abbreviated cape of white crepe romane with an exaggerated Peter Pan collar, caught at the neck with white ribbon ties. The satin face of the material is used for narrow panels.

SPORTSMEN'S PROTEST BLOCKS CARP SEINERS

The usual fight over the netting of carp from Black Lake is being staged this winter again.

The fishermen have apparently won the fight this year. Edward Oswald of Spring Lake, and George Bender of Holland, who were awarded the contract for taking the carp from the lake, have been notified to stop operations after a protest had been filed by Holland sportsmen.

The sportsmen here contend that the netting of the carp injures game fishing in Black Lake. They contend that the carp come in from Lake Michigan in great numbers and as a rssult there is no need of netting them.

The contractor made one haul, obtaining about eight tons of carp. The lake is dotted with fish shanties at present.

STATE TO SEND POTATO TRAIN OUT MARCH 14-26

Definite dates for the operation of Michigan's first potato train over the Michigan Central lines in south-western Michigan have been set for Mar. 14 to 26 by Michigan State College. The farm crops department of the college is co-operating with the railroad in the operation of the train.

The train is to be operated in an effort to interest farmers in Lower Michigan in better cultural practices and the use of northern grown certified seed to improve the quality of potatoes. Half day stops will be made at 25 stations in 11 counties, starting from Jackson.

Recognizing reforestration work carried on by Chicago Boy Scouts on lands bordering Lake Michigan in Muskegon county, the conservation commission has recommended that the lands planted be assessed at the rate of five cents an acre instead of being carried on the tax rolls at the usual property tax rate.

CHINESE RUG IS BULLET RIDDLED

Real evidence of the militaristic outbreaks in China is exhibited in three rugs imported with others from China by Mrs. Howard B. Merrick of Ann Arbor, who exhibited a large collection of Chinese rugs at the 98th semi-annual furniture market held recently at Grand Rapids.

Perhaps significant is the fast that one of the rugs with 12 bullets lodged beneath the nap and ruined beyond repair, contained the sacred design of the tree of jewels used in the Buddist worship and held sacred within the portals of Chinese homes.

It is said the Chinese wholly disapprove of the use of this design in a rug for Americans to walk upon and reports are to the effect that many of the workers refused to weave the rugs for such use.

The different semi-precious jewels, such as green and white jade, turquoise, amethyst, coral, crystal and amber, forming the blossoms of a tree set in a carved ivory pot, compose the design. The colors worked into the tree vie in richness with those of the jewels themselves and stand out against the plain background by wedge carving done by the master artists.

Mrs. Merrick became interested in Chinese rugs as a hobby when her husband, the late Professor Merrick of the University of Michigan, presented her with a Chinese rug with her name woven in the design as a wedding anniversary gift. This led to the study of the process of weaving while residing in China and now Mrs. Merrick has turned her hobby into a commercial enterprise while she is continuing her study of the meaning of every symbol woven into the rugs.

CLOTHING LINKS STYLE, ECONOMY

Economical buying does not mean purchasing cheap clothes, but it means choosing the best that one ran afford and getting the most use out of it. It is not economical for instance, for a business girl to buy for office wear a flimsy frock that soon becomes shabby or a dress of extreme design or color that does not harmonize with the rest of her wardrobe. The wise shopper will not only see that she receives full value for her money in the quality of the goods she buys, but she will not allow herself to be tempted to purchase what will not fit into her color scheme. It is by keeping in mind a definite color harmony for clothes that milady may avoid the disappointment caused by the haphazard and expensive method of buying whatever chances to strike her fancy. By limiting herself to a given group of related colors she may always be sure that the accessories of her dress are in keeping with all her costumes and that she presents an attractive and harmonious ensemble.

To illustrate just how this principle may be applied in individual cases let us suppose that a warm brown color scheme has been chosen for a brunette with medium skin, dark brown hair and brown or hazel eyes.

The brown eyed blond with medium or dark skin would find this type of color harmony becoming, as would also the auburn brunet.

The basis of such a wardrobe might be a dark brown coat with beaver or reccoon trimming. The everyday hat may be in a light brown or green felt with a bright feather or ribbon ornament. For dres occasions a gaily embroidered silk hat may be worn. Shoes may be of dark brown suede or kid or alligator with lighter stockings. An orange and green scarf, green cloth or alligator skin handbag, and a brown silk umbrella with amber mountings complete the outdoor costume.

For the feet that trip gayly along, or those that walk more sedately, the best foot can be put forward in appropriate shoe attire. The realization that well shod feet bespeak the smartly dressed woman is becoming more prevalent every day. In fact, it appears that each pair of shoes was made to be worn with some particular gown, so well does the general ensemble harmonize. And, the lovely new opalescent leathers in pastel shades, the artistic combination of leathers and colors, lead one to believe that the vernal season is aproaching.

For street wear, reptile leathers lead the mode; and justly so, as they are both smart and practical. In strap models or built up oxford effects, with either high or low heels, to suit the individual taste, they step along to fashion's latest times. No leather seems sufficient unto itself, as it takes at least two different kinds to make a shoe this spring—usually a plain color and one that is checked or patterned. Lizard, snake skin and patent leathers are made more individual with inserts, bands and appliques of kid in self-tone or contrasting colors. Black is still in the lime light and brown and tan in all of the newest hues are extremely popular, especially the different tones of beige. Gray also is included in the spring shoe color chart, and when combined with black is delightfully chick.

A most fitting prologue to spring is found in the afternoon and semi-dress footwear. The general tendency in all styles of this class is toward light colored shoes. The two toned combinations and intricate designs are so subtle in their treatment and so charmingly effective that this article of apparel can be made the main point of interest—shoes that transform gowns into costumes, as it were. One of the newest features is the checked gingham and salt and pepper kid trimming on a plain colored shoe—usually beige. For southern wear the pastel shades seem to be most wanted, and it is safe to say, are a precoursor of summer styles in the North. It is prophesied that these new colors will be worn with white and light hued summer frocks instead of the regulation white foot wear of former years, and the idea is very intriguing.

SHERWOOD GIRL TEAM DECLARED CHAMP IN STATE BASKETBALL

Although Sherwood high school has only 22 girl students, its basket ball squad, composed of nine of the girls has not been beaten on the home court in eight years. It has not lost a game in three years.

Of 90 games played, Sherwood lost only two—one to Sturgis and the other to Bronson. Both games were played before the Sherwood team became the veteran athletic organization that has swept all rivalry before it since 1919.

Wherefore, Superintendent C. G. Sudman, who coaches the team, has claimed the state championship for his girls; and is ready to battle any sextet anywhere in Michigan.

On the annual schedule of the Sherwood team are such able sextets as Battle Creek Sanitarium, Three Rivers, Coldwater, Sturgis, Vicksburg and Athens.

The squad is composed of Captain Mabel Westendorf, Agnes Gawlawk, Bertha Rumsey, Gladys Mowery, Flora Robbins, Helen Cline, Le'ah Cross, Garnett Stouringer, Ruth Lee, Winona Bathrick, Thyra Carswell and Edna Thrams.

8 YEARS SPENT IN BILLARD GAME

Eight years ago, William H. Quigley, Grand Rapids druggist, and Harry R. Wells, owner of a trucking business, met at the Masonic temple at Grand Rapids and suggested playing a game of billiards.

Today, they're still playing the same game, with the points well over the 200,000 mark and with the actual playing time totaling 3,583 hours.

In the fall of 1919, the pair started their first game and since that time they have played every Tuesday evening, starting at 5 p. m. and keeping an eye on the balls on the green tops until midnight. No time for dinner on billiard nights for Quigley and Wells—they established that rule when they played only a few years.

If the long game were to stop at the present time, Mr. Wells would be the winner by a small margin. In all, 2,999 blocks have been played and Mr. Quigley is only 63 points behind.

FEED WILD LIFE, IS PLEA UNTIL THAWS RELEASE THEIR FOOD

It would be difficult to find a true sportsman who does not believe that "now is the time when all good conservationists should come to the aid of the members of the wild fowl and animal world."

Seldom has Michigan been blanketed more deeply with a coverlet of snow. Not only this, but the constant freezing has formed the surface moisture into, as far as wild life is concerned, an impenetrable counterpane that has locked the greater part of their food suppiles as securely out of their food supplies as securely out ot and sealed in some vault.

A stroll through the woods will reveal many covies of quail huddled dispiritedly together. Outside of the friendly air of human benefactors there is little to protect them from starvation.

Wherever farm animals are being present themselves hungrily salvagfed near the woods, squirrels quickly ing the few kernels of grain that have escaped the gormandizing of the fattening farm animals.

So keen is the demand for the timber of the hickory nut tree by the various manufactories that few are left. And consequently small is the store of nuts that the squirrel is able to gather together for the winter months, more and more, as our natural resources become depleted, have we robbed wild life of its natural food supplies, and made of it a pensioner upon our none too liberal charity. Wild life needs the friendly aid of every one interested in its welfare during cold, bleak days.

GRAND HAVEN ASKS FOR RESTOCKING OF RABBITS

The cotton tail rabbit, once so plentiful in Michigan, is passing with the other game. This is indicated by the reports of game wardens, members of Izaak Walton league chapters and others in Michigan.

The Grand Haven chapter has made a plea to have that section of the state restocked with rabbits.

A new invention for swimmers is a special shoe fitted with two tiny boards. These fold against the water when coming forward, but open out with the kick and allow a greater "grip" than can be had with the naked feet.

TREES DRUNKARDS BUT THRIVE ON IT

Trees are confirmed drinkers. No solids for them. They have no temperate habtis. They drink continuously or not at all. Thus they live and grow as extremists and are either destroyed or die of old age unreformed.

In fact, the older they are the harder they drink and the greater their thirst. But no tree was ever found the worse for drinking. When they sleep in winter they go to the other extreme and are teetotalers, but with the first sunshine and thaw of spring they resume their bibulous habits.

When a tree once takes its place at Nature's great fountain "the earth's sweet flowing breast" it demands a steady supply of food and if it doesn't get it it goes into a huff, throws off its handsome headdress, withers, and dies and turns up its heels to the sky.

The liquid food of the tree is brewed in the ground. Water is the important ingredient. Billions of bacteria work to make soluable many substances so they may be dissolved by water and taken into the circulatory system of the tree. The tiny roots of the tree drink this life fluid, which is lifted hundreds of feet as if by a miracle defying the laws of gravity without any moving machinery. This fluid is distributed to the branches, thence to the leaves, the stomach of the tree, where another miracle is performed when the liquid is digested and made ready to be formed into wood.

The tree grows year by year like a person in height and girth. If the tree falls in the forest billions of bacteria will get hold of it, and with the help of air and sun and moisture its substance will eventually be transformed into the liquid food for other trees.

PERCH JUMP AT FISHERS IS CRYSTAL LAKE TALE

Perch fishing in Crystal lake, always a popular winter sport at Beulah, where the average "yellow-bellie" is from nine to thirteen inches in length, has taken on a new impetus, since they have started jumping right out of the water at the fishermen.

Aubrey Moss and Frank Nelson, youths, chopped away at the ice until they were ready to "bust" their fishing hole—and when they broke the last barrier, letting the water rush up, two fine perch came with it, as a starter for the day's creel.

The incident reminded them strongly of the smelt run here in spring, when the smelt actually become so numerous in Beulah creek that they crowded each other out of the water.

Fishing for perch in the water is especially interesting because the fish can be seen biting 100 or more feet down in the crystal clear water from which the lake takes its name.

MARCELINE DAY in "THE BOY FRIEND"

Golden Wedding Anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. Abner Junnings

Rich in joyous recollections
Is this day, dear friends, for you;
Mem'ry guides your glad reflection
To the days when love was new.

To the bride's mind comes the picture
Of her shimmering gown of white;
With the flowers and the "fixings",
'Twas indeed a lovely sight!

And the groom, perhaps, remembers
How his knees just seemed to quake
As he marched with steps well measured
With his bride the vows to take.

Tho' we cannot witness with you
All the joys that filled that scene,
Tho' we cannot travel backward
O'er the years that stretch between.

Yet our hearts are glad with your hearts,
And your cares we'd gladly bear,
For we've had no joys or sorrows
But you've borne with us a share.

Fifty years you've lived among us,
Fifty years of service true,
With our lives your lives are welded,
You've been neighbors all true blue!

Years of work and years of sharing
Merit all the bliss you've had,
And we hope that in the future
You'll find much to make you glad!

Mr. and Mr. Jennings-Altho I have known
You for only a year, I am sure I Could write this sincerely if I had known you for fifty.

STATE CROP VALUE DROPS $16,000,000

Crops grown on Michigan farms in 1926 were worth $16,000,000 less than in 1925, it is revealed in the general summary for the year just issued by Verne H. Church, agricultural statistician.

The total in 1926 was estimated at $254,000,000, as compared with $269,956,000 in 1925. The 1924 crops were valued at $258,263,000.

"The decrease was not due so much to reduced production as to lower prices," says Mr. Church. "While the corn, bean and clover seed crops were considerably smaller than in 1925, the production of hay, potatoes and most of the fruits was much larger. The only grain crops having a greater value than the preceding year were wheat and barley. The hay crop was worth more and peaches, pears and grapes brought a larger return because of the greater volume. However, the price per unit of nearly all fruits was much below that of 1925."

Bad weather handicapped the corn crop. Growth was delayed due to the cool season, and a hard front on September 26 caught much of the corn before it had matured. As a result, only 55 per cent of the crop was of merchantable quality, as compared with 83 per cent the year before and the 10-year average of 74 per cent.

The price of corn December 1 was 73 cents a bushel, giving the crop a total value of $39,538,000 or $24.82 an acre. The 1925 crop was valued at $49,260,000, and the value per acre was $30.21. The yield of silage corn in 1926 was seven tons an acre, or two tons below the 1925 average.

Bean growers suffered even more severely from the unfavorable weather in 1926 than they did the year before. Mr. Church estimates that 174,000 acres were not harvested last fall an area twice as great as in 1925. The 174,000 acres unharvested represent 24 per cent of the 725,000 acres planted last spring.

MONROE MAN WINS CROWN AS STATE'S CORN GROWING KING

Paul Clemens, a farmer living near Britton and leading corn grower of Monroe county, was crowned Michigan Corn King at the annual meeting of the Michigan Crop Improvement association at Michigan State college.

He registered an official yield of 90 bushels of shelled corn to the acre, an amount which, valued at $65.70 an acre, brought in the greatest returns over the cost of cultural operations of all the contestants in the five acre corn contest sponsored by the crops association and the farm crops department of the college.

Clements was elected last fall to charter membership in the honorary Michigan Master Farmers' club, and is widely known as a seed corn grower. He grew his big 1926 crop on land which previously had been in alfalfa and the seed was of his own breeding known as "Clements' White Cap."

Ernest Gilbert, Coldwater, who holds the contest yield record of 112 bushels to the acre, for 1925, finished second in the 1926 contest, with a yield of 89 bushels. Bronze medals for yields of 75 to 85 bushels an acre were awarded to Otto Wegner, Riga; George Bruce, Britton, and Fritz Mantey, Fairgrove.

BABY DEATH RATE IN DETROIT CALLED HIGH

Figures compiled by Dr. Herman N. Bundeser disclosed that Chicago had the lowest baby death rate for all cities exceeding a million population in the United States in 1926.

For every thousand births, the death rate for the following cities show: Chicago, 67; New York, 68; Los Angeles, 68; Philadelphia, 77 and Detroit, 86.

NEW CANNING METHOD AIDS KIEFFER GROWERS

Discovery of a new method of canning Kieffer pears promises to turn loss to profit for many Michigan fruit growers in the opinion of March C. Hutchinson, president of the Michigan State Canners association.

Three Michigan factories used the new process last year and succeeded in packing Kieffer pears so skillfully that they resembled Bartletts. These plans used 115,000 bushels of Kieffers last year. One plant did not complete its pack until February 1 this year, and Mr. Hutchinson reported the bulk of the pack had been sold.

Under the new process the pears are held in cold storage until the factory receives orders for fresh supplies. Then the fruit is removed from storage to a ripening room where it is matured before being put in tins.

In the past Michigan fruit growers have found the Kieffer pear a drug on the market. Thousands of bushels rotted in the orchards last fall.

GUARDIAN OF U. S. WATERS 40 YEARS QUITS ON PENSION

The lang period of Otto Redman's service with the United States Government has come to a close. For nearly 40 years he was in the employ of the Government, first as a member of the Coast Guard and later in the lighthouse service. For the last eight years he was keeper of the lighthouse at Windmill Point. But he isn't needed there any longer. The old Government buildings at this point are to be razed to make room for the Marine Hospital to be built in the spring, and although some danger signal is necessary, it is probable that from now on, automatically-controlled electric lights will warn ships of the dangerous shoals off Wndmill Point. Furthermore, he celebrated his sixty-fifth birthday the other day, so Mr. Redman has retired. Granted a leave of absence until the petition for retirement is formally approved by the Secretary of Commerce, he has gone to California.

Mr. Redman's maritime experience began early, for as a baby he came to this country from Germany on the maiden voyage of the Germania, one of the first steel steamships to be built. The passage was made in nine days, breaking all previous records. Two years later, the Germania sank off Trespassy, Newfoundland.

The Redman family lived in New York State for a short time and then came to Michigan, settling in Sand Beach, later to be known as Harbor Beach. Otto obtained work at the Harbor of Refuge and remained there for seven years. Then in 1891 he joined the United States Coast Guard and for the next four years was stationed at Pointe Aux Barques. It was while he was there that the Philadelphia-Albany wreck occurred.

APPLE STYLES FICKLE AS WOMAN'S HAIR CUTS

Charles T. Gramm, Lapeer county farmer and horticulturist, points out the fact that styles in varieties of apples grown by Thumb farmers have changed during the last quarter century, along with almost every other phase of farm life.

"Twenty-five years ago," said Mr. Gramm, "such well known varieties as Steele's Red, Bell Flower, Maiden Blush, Spitzenberg, Pound Pippins, Greasy Pippins, Rhode Island Greening, Strawberry, Rambo and many other varieties were found on every farm, along with the old favorite, the Northern Spy and Baldwin.

"Practically all these have disappeared, with the exception of the last two. Even these old stand bys have given way many times to the newer varieties like Wealthy, Ben Davis and others, though the Ben Davis is a second cousin to the old Romanite which was unfit for eating at any time except in the spring long after all the others had decayed."

75 PCT. U. S. AUTO TAX PAID IN STATE

Uncle Sam collected slightly over 75 per cent of his taxes on automobiles and motorcycles from Michigan sources in the calendar year, 1926, the total for the country as a whole being $88,920,180 and for Michigan $66,885,049. These figures were announced by the bureau of internal revenue.

While the total of the tax collection in the country shows a decrease of about 20 per cent below the $111,984,829 total for 1925, and the Michigan rate of decrease from the state's total of $83,286,679 for 1925 was almost as great, the fact remains that the Wolverine state's proportion of the whole was about one per cent greater in 1926 than the year preceding. That proves that the industry is gaining in Michigan faster than in the nation at large.

Ohio, with $6,620,451, was the second heaviest payer of auto taxes into the federol treasury in 1926, and Indiana was third with $4,694,398—closely pushed by Wisconsin with $4,234,660. In 1925 the positions of Indiana and Ohio were reversed, the Hoosier state then being second, with $8,371,852, and Ohio turning in $7,848,799. Wisconsin was in fourth place in 1925, as in 1926, her total in the former year being $4,932,725.

Estate taxes collected by the federal government in Michigan, in 1926, aggregated only $1,949,103, compared with $4,026,719 the year before. The whole country paid under this head almost as much in 1926 as it did in 1925, the respective totals being $107,341,905 and $110,758,984. New York was by far the leading source with $36,004,901, in 1926, and $44,018,420 in 1925.

STATE TAX INCREASE IN 1926 RECORD IN MICHIGAN HISTORY

The second greatest increase in taxes on property in the history of the state was recorded in 1926, according to a report completed by George Lord, chairman of the state tax commission. Thelevy was $220,092,608, as compared with $191,660,043 in 1925—an increase of $28,342,565. The only other advance that surpassed it was in 1920 when the increase over the preceding year was nearly $30,000,000.

The average tax rate in 1926 went to $29.10 per $1000 of valuation, as compared with $27.56 in 1925. The assessed valuation advanced from $6,954,262,131 in 1925, to $7,558,802,199 in 1926.

All of the increase was for local governmental purposes. There was no increase in the state tax levy. According to Chairman Lord, school improvements and large road expenditures accounted for much of the increase. He declared that in some agricultural districts, where the valuation of the property actually decreased, budgets for schools and other improvements were increased. Thus, while the valuation went down, taxes went up and the rate, of course, had to be high enough to realize more money on less valuation.

DISCOVER FORGOTTEN PAPERS SIGNED BY GEORGE WASHINGTON

Honorable discharge papers of a Revolutionary War soldier, signed by George Washington, as commander-in-chief of the Continental Army, and other members of the staff, have been discovered at Ann Arbor by a student of the University of Michigan. The document, which has great historical as well as intrinsic value, was found in a file of old newspapers borrowed by the student, who was delving into papers dating back many years.

So far there has been no record found of its existence and its presence in the files is unexplainable. So far as known the document is not registered by any of the historical societies.

To "bob" or "not to bob" their hair still is a vital question with women folks the world over. Taylor—still has ner long hair and refuses to sacrifice it to the demands of fashion.

The above is a most recent portrait of Miss Taylor.

3 STATE COLLEGE CO-EDS DEPART FOR DEBATING TOUR

Three Michigan State college co-eds, armed with statistics culled from books of law and history, have left East Lansing for a tour of Wisconsin and Illinois, in the course of which they will meet debating teams from three other colleges.

The M. S. C. co-eds will argue in the affirmative of the question: "Resolved, that the American jury system be abolished." They represent one of the two teams who will carry on the business of women's debating at the college this season, and their trip will be the longest ever taken by State college co-eds.

Selected by Coach Henry W. Blake as the most skilled women debaters on the campus, the co-eds have received thorough training for their work. Miss Florence Alice Allbright, of Saginaw is the "veteran" having been interested in debating for the last three years.

Miss Margaret Winters of Lansing was a member of the 1926 team. The third of the trio, Mrs. Mildred Markel of East Lansing is a new recruit added to the ranks this year.

LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER FIRST TIME OFF ISLE IN 31 YEARS

Last summer Dominick Gallagher, light house keeper on Beaver Island, went twice to Charlevoix for gasoline. This was the first time he had been off the island in 31 years.

For 26 years Mr. Dominick has been at the light house, first as second assistant, then as first assistant and now as head keeper.

"Why should I bother to go to the mainland?" he blandly inquired of a mid winter visitor to the island, when it was suggested that 31 years represents a long exile from the world. "We have everything on the island we need. There are a thousand of us here and we have mighty good times, even in winter. And the radio tells us everything that is going on. What more can you ask?"

Last winter when the breaking of the telephone cable made it impossible to communicate with Beaver, the islanders heard on their radio receiving sets the hubbub being raised as to their welfare, but had no means of answering back that they were well and comfortable and happy.

DEER ARE REPORTED AS WINTERING WELL IN NORTH

Deer are wintering well throughout the Upper Pensinsula is the word sent down by the northern conservation officers. In the neighborhood of Hulbert, Chippewa county, lies one of the largest yarding areas of deer in the U. P. Practically every year it has been necessary to haul hay and forage into this yard to help the animals through the winter, but this year they have experienced no difficulty in securing all of the browse they need. The same reports come from the Taquemenon River district and the extreme westerly yarding places in Iron and Ontonagon counties. Although observers state that does and fawns predominate in numbers there is no dearth of bucks.

END OF GAME SEASON PUTS BAN ON ALL GUNS

February 15 marked the wind up of the hunting season and any one possessing a shot gun or rifle in the woods without a special permit is a law violator. This restriction continues in effect until the opening day of the wild fowl season, September 16. Some complaints are being registered by trappers against the provisions of this law. They claim that it works a hardship with them in maintaining a trap line. One of the commonest practices on the trap line is the killing of trapped animals with a 22 rifle, but the Shiras law prevents this unless the conservation department grants a permit.

COOLIDGE ACTS TO SPEED UP BUILDING AT EAST LANSING

It has been necessary for President Coolidge to take action to prevent indefinite delay, due to a ruling of Comptroller-General McCarl, in beginning construction of the United States weather bureau building at East Lansing under an appropriation of $38,000 carried in the agricultural bill, enacted January 11, 1927. The president sent to the speaker of the house the draft of legislation which he asked congress to enact, authorizing and directing McCarl to credit the department of agriculture with payments heretofore or hereafter made to architects or contractors for plans and supervisory work in connection with the erection of the East Lansing building. The comptroller-general had ruled that the amount appropriated by congress was not available for services of the sort described.

BEAN COUNT CHAMP, INDIAN CHIEF'S KIN IS CHARLEVOIX MAILMAN

For 15 years Daniel A. McSawby, grandson of an Indian chief, has been carrying letters for Uncle Sam in Charlevoix. Each summer resident knows him and knows also that the big hill near town called Mt. McSawby was named after his grandfather, head of the Ottawas in the days when the tribal organization still existed. The chief's Indian name was Kit-chi-ba-ka-si-gan, which may be roughly translated into English as "The Big Gun." Captain George W. Weaver, Charlevoix post master, speaks of the grandson of The Big Gun as one of the quietest, pleasantest and the most faithful mail carriers in his employ.

Mr. McSawby, who is now 35 years old, won fame several years ago when he was awarded a set of silver offered by a Charlevoix firm to the one guessing nearest to the number of beans in a jar—a trick jar, made with sloping sides and thick glass to deceive the eye. The Indian postman not only came nearest to guessing the number of beans, but actually guessed it exactly right.

"How did I do it? It was a good deal of luck, I suppose. But I also studied that jar as it stood in the window, tried to calculate how much space was lost by the thick glass and the slope—and then probably I just happened to hit it right."

LITTLE CHANGE IN CROP STATUS SEEN

Business and agricultural conditions will remain, in Michigan and other states, virtually the same in 1927 as during the last year, according to a statement by Professor J. T. Horner, head of the agricultural economics department of Michigan State college.

There will be a weakening of non-agricultural products during the first half of the year and a strengthening in the last half, according to Professor Horner, who states that competition is keen and will keep prices low, so that profits must come from economy of production.

"The outlook for Michigan agriculture is on the whole more favorable than that for the country at large," he declares. "The economic positions of industry and agriculture will remain virtually unchanged this year, however.

"Although there may be, during the first six months, slightly greater colume and lower prices, business conditions for the entire year will show no let down. Unfavorable factors are: A let up in building and depression in the automobile industry due to a full market and too much competition. On the other hand, we count as favorable, the efficiency of labor, better conditions in Europe and easy money. There can be no serious depression with the volume of money in circulation that we have today.

Regarding the agricultural situation in Michigan and the country at large, Professor Horner makes the following prophesies: Live stock industry promises to be the most profitable of all, dairying is the best in several years; potato market is good, although there is danger of increasing the acreage, and he advises farmers to plant in about the same amounts as for 1926; poultry out look is good; fruit will be produced in quantities, but without the over production of the past year; and the market cannot absorb all the beans Michigan can grow.

He urges farmers to grow more alfalfa and sweet clover, since live stock should be fed from home grown produce as much as possible, for transportation costs make importing of feed expensive and there is a great deal of land which can be used for no other purpose.

$225,000 GIVEN IN CANCER WAR

Research into the causes and possible cure of cancer was given added impetus at the University of Michigan when the regents of the institution announced the gift of $225,000 from three anonymous donors. Approximately $45,000 will be expended annually in establishing and maintaining a laboratory, but, according to Dr. Clarence Cook Little, president of the university, quarters, heat and light will be provided by the regents in the new medical building, and the gift in reality will amount to $75,000 a year.

Commenting on the research fund, Dr. Little said:

"This gift, with its board and comprehensive aims, gives us an opportunity to approach the problem of cancer and other forms of growth from a free and unhampered point of view.

"I hope that the university may obtain the services of a small group of outstanding experimental biologists to undertake research in this field.

"A total of $225,000, which will be available over a five-year period, will give a splendid opportunity for testing on a satisfactory scale certain theories of and avenues of approach to the factors that control both normal and cancerous growth."

$9 A MONTH ONCE PAY OF MICHIGAN TEACHERS

Back in the days when the dreaded hickory stick was flourished ominously before those unruly ones who violated the laws of the school room, school teachers were a poorly paid lot.

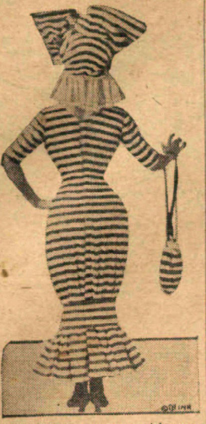
Records unearthed at Albion by Geo. Sweeney, a pioneer of the section, reveal that Miss Frances M. Tuttle, now dead, who taught in the Eckford township school in 1868, received nine dollars a month for her labors.

Sweeney, who attended the school when Miss Tuttle was teaching, avers that for a time he served as janitor after school hours and was given the then munificent salary of $2 a month. Often, he states, he stayed in the building through the night so that the school would be warm for the teacher in the morning.

Another interesting story of his school days often told by Sweeney is that of a school board which voted $150 to build a fence, repair the school house, pay off back indebtedness and settle incidental accounts.

"You bet the $150 did the trick," Sweeney stated. "It isn't much money now, but at that time it was a small fortune."

DON'T LAUGH GIRLS— THIS WAS "REAL CLASS" TWENTY YEARS AGO



Twenty-five years ago, girls never thought styles would affect so radical an outline as that pictured. But happen it did five years later—along about 1906 or 1907. And decidedly popular it was, too!

If a fetching outfit of that kind were to make an appearance on the streets now—half a dozen persons would be running to fetch a cop or inquire of him "what's this one-act comedy coming along the sidewalk here?"

OLIVET CO-EDS TOP MEN IN STANDING LISTS GIVEN OUT

The co-eds of Olivet college lead the men in scholarship, according to summary of grades for the first semester by Dr. A. B. Stowe, registrar of the college, which shows that the three sororities and the non-society women have higher scholastic standings than the fraternities and non-society men.

The issuing of marks for the first semester showed unsual high standing among the co-eds, so nearly all pledges of the three sororities were initiated into full membership. The new members are announced as follows:

LUMBER VILLAGE GOES IN PATH OF SUBDIVIDER

Platting of one of the finest resort developments on the West Michigan coast is being completed near Montague, north of the old channel from White Lake to Lake Michigan. Four hundred acres of land fronting on Lake Michigan are included in the project, which is to be known as Old Channel Trail Estates and is being platted on the country estate plan, with four or five acres to each summer home site.

The rise of Old Channel Trail Estates marks the disappearance of another lumbering village where millions of feet of Muskegon county pine timber were sawed and loaded for distant ports.

WOMEN AS JURORS IN DETROIT TRIAL LASTING 4 YEARS

The Ramp and Sump club of Detroit has been dissolved and Judge Ormond F. Hunt, honorary president, and the five women jurors who constituted the rest of the association, bade one another forewell after four years sitting on a case in Judge Hunt's court.

The club was organized by the five women on a jury empanelled in 1923 to try the case of Arthur J. Jarvis, a Detroit garage owner, against Morris H. Higer, a broker and R. B. McFadden, a building contractor.

For the benefit of the uninitiated, a sump is the well in which the mechanic dives to oil your car, while the ramp, if any, is the incline that carries the car upstairs instead of an elevator.

Higer and McFadden started to build a garage and service station for Jarvis, in May, 1922, but something happened and the job was not finished in the agreed time. The jury awarded Jarvis a verdict of $63,400.

The trial lasted nearly four years, being delayed by a train of accidents and other things. After the first week the trial proceeded with only 11 persons on the jury. This was because David M. Currie asked to be relieved because he could not support his family on the $4 a day salary of a juror and had been offered a job at $15 a day as a millwright in a motor car plant. He was excused.

Shortly afterwards Alvin D. Hersch, Jarvis' attorney, fell and broke his leg at a Christmas party, and continued the case in a hospital chair.

The ladies, seeing that a long session was before them, brought their sewing and organized the Ramp and Sump club, those two words figuring every minute or so in the arguments. Then, Mrs. Gertrude Bryant, president of the club, fell down a flight in the county building and sprained her ankle. For the next week or so she came to court on crutches.

Judge Hunt said he believed the trial was the longest on record in circuit court.

RUSS. PRINCESS IS BRIDE OF WORKER

A Russian princess stepped from a train in the Michigan Central station at Detroit into the arms of her fiance, Nicholas Rybakoff, now a mechanic at the Ford Highland Park factory, but formerly colonel of the czar's Pereiaslavsky regiment.

The Princess Tamara, widow of Prince Kropotkin, has been waiting three and one-half years for this moment, three and one-half years she and Rybakoff have been separated by the vagaries of fate and immigration laws. With her come her son, Prince Igor, eight years old, who has been with her in Harbin while she and Rybakoff have moved the heavens and earth of officialdom in their long effort to meet and marry.

"I met the princess during the Great War when I was wounded, in a Galatian hospital. She, like so many women of the nobility, was a nurse," Rybakoff explained.

"After Prince Kropotkin was killed by the bolsheviki, we were forced into exile and met in Harbin. Later we became engaged and we decided that I could come to America, become established, and then bring her here. Well, I have ben established long enough, but I did not reckon with quotas and pass ports and all that they mean."

Apartment quarters and a job at a motor plant is a far call from the court of the Romanoffs and the stirring days of the Great War and the Red revolution, but that does not worry Rybakoff.

CITY OF 40,000 IS SEEN IN MERGER OF DEARBORN, FORDSON

A new city of 40,000 population loomed as more than a possibility following a meeting in Dearborn of officials of Fordson, Dearborn, Township and Ford Motor Co.

The meeting resulted in the formation of a committee to survey the territory with a view to consolidating the three political entities. Clarence Parker, supervisor of Dearborn Township, was named chairman, with three members to be selected by each of the municipal councils.

Mayor Joseph M. Karmann, of Fordson pointed out that both Dearborn and Fordson need many improvements which consolidation would make possible and said that each municipality complemented the other. Where Fordson is industrial in type, Dearborn is largely residental, he said. Joining them would bring about improvements in each and in that part of the township between them.

Together, they could make their own improvements much more cheaply and expeditiously than they could separately, and more quickly than if they were annexed to Detroit, he added.

Boy---Deprived of Hands---Uses Teeth for Writing

Here's one ambitious youngster Hard Luck hasn't "licked" by a long shot. He is little Charlie Mann, 8 years old, of Richmond Hills, N. Y. Deprived of both his hands, he has learned to use his teeth with remarkable ability to do his writing. Consequently, he ranks high in his school classes!

The youngster lost his hands when gangrene set in after they had been severely burned in coming in contact with a live wire on a telegraph pole.

WINTER TOURING IS SEEN FOR FUTURE IN UPPER PENINSULA

Keeping upper Michigan's main highways open to auto traffic all winter may lead to the birth of a new industry in the Calumet district, that of winter touring and the introduction of winter sports on a larger scale. With the frost of the winter's storm passed and traffic maintained almost without interruption, highway officials believe the time has arrived when the peninsula's highways will be open from end to end for 12 months every year.

Residents of the eastern end of the peninsula have found a thrill in a long automobile drive during the week ends when visits were made in Copper country and Gogebic towns. Residents of the Copper country have found trips to the lower peninsula and into Wisconsin just as novel and delightful.

The result is that trips between the upper peninsula cities are becoming common and driving over long stretches of state highway is an attractive recreation.

In the long stretches of road between towns and through timberland the winter tourist finds a complete change of scenery. The absence of foliage gives the traveler a view far into the woods, across country and over the hills. Places which attracted no attention in the summer come in for a lingering examination.

The safety of winter driving adds to the pleasure of travel. In nearly every case the winter roads are lined with high banks of snow and the ditches are completely covered. It is almost impossible for a car to swerve off the road.

PURCHASERS OF FARM 10 YEARS AGO HITS OIL

Some 20 persons in Battle Creek who, more than 10 years ago joined L. D. Wood in the purchase of extensive farm holdings in Oklahoma, are now to enjoy rich rewards on their investments as a result of the discovery of oil on the property located between Boice City and Two Buttes, Oklahoma.

The property, covering several thousand acres, was purchased for its agriculture value and until a few months ago was devoted exclusively to farming, neither Wood or his associates having any intimation that oil might be found upon the land. Two weeks ago, however, experiments on a shaft resulted in discovery of oil which has tested "18," an unusual richness, it is said. The first well is known as Ramsey No. 1.

Reverses came at a time when the holders of the property had apparently "struck it rich" came a week later when the hugh derrick erected over the Ramsey, was destroyed by fire of unknown origin. The well, however, which has been proclaimed by some experts as promising developments surpassing even those of the famous "Panhandle" has attracted speculators from far and wide.

5,000 UPPER PENINSULA YOUTHS IN FARM CLUBS

Nearly 5000 boys and girls in the rural sections of the upper peninsula are now engaged in farm club work. The increase for the year was about 500.

Iron county leads with 913 boys and girls enrolled. Gogebic county is second with 703. Menominee is third with 597, Delta fourth with 533, and Ontonagon fifth with 443.

Girls in rural communities to the number of 1418 are learning how to sew and to make garments under skilled supervision. Handicraft club work for boys has enlisted 903. Garden club work for both girls and boys is occupying the attention of 732.

WINDSTORMS BIG FACTOR IN DETROIT'S MAIL RACE

Wind storms in the western part of the United States are proving an unexpected factor in Detroit's official test of the relative speeds of air mail and train mail, which was started with the mailing of two letters to California, one by each service. Mayor John W. Smith mailed a letter by air mail to James Rolph, Jr., mayor of San Francisco, while Postmaster Charles C. Kellogg mailed a letter to travel by train to W. W. Moore, also of San Francisco.

The test is being made in connection with the ceremony marking the first anniversary of Detroit's air mail service and the Detroit Adcraft Club's campaign to popularize this service.

MUSKEGON AUTO MEN TO UNITE IN ADVERTISING

The Windsor plan of co-operative advertising and standardization of the used car values has been adopted by the Muskegon Auto Trade Association.

In putting this plan into effect the dealers as a group will at intervals advertise what they consider to be a fair used car value on various makes for specific yearly models. The plan was accepted by the dealers after letters had been read showing that the system had worked satisfactorily at Windsor, Hamilton and other Canadian cities.

TRAVERSE TO PLANT TREES FOR FUND TO AID NEEDY STUDENTS

Something new in the way of reforestation is being offered near Traverse, where a local luncheon club is planning to purchase 40 acres of ground which will be planted to pine and Norway spruce. The trees will be set out by the school children of the city. When the time arrives to harvest the Christmas trees from the crop the school children will again aid in the work.

It is planned to take the money derived from the sale of trees and use it to get financial aid for high school students who are hindered by lack of funds.

It is believed that the proceeds of the sale of the spruce from the 40 acres will create a fund which will be large enough to meet the needs of the Traverse City students.

With the spruce harvested the pine will form a perpetual beauty spot in the Traverse City region.

The method used in the planting of the trees is to put the seedling trees in the bottoms of plowed furrows with a dibble or spud. Care is taken to have the roots of the tiny trees well down in the depression. The furrow is left open and the ground is not cultivated.

The trees should be set either in the spring, not later than May 30, or else in the last half of September and in October. The trees make very little growth the first year, but advance rapidly in size after that.

SOIL IS HOBBY OF RICH MEN DESPITE ABSENCE OF PROFIT

Although Senator James Couzens of Detroit has given up his $100,000 hobby farm because he couldn't make it produce dividends, other wealthy men of Michigan continue to play with the soil. For instance, there is Noys N. Avery of Grand Rapids, president of a trust company. Mr. Avery has a hobby farm at Eastmanville, in Ottawa county, that is one of the show places of that part of Michigan. In addition to the model farm home and farm buildings, Mr. Avery has built such refinements as tennis courts, sunken gardens, parks and winding drives.

Like Senator Couzens, Mr. Avery admits he cannot make the farm declare dividends in dollars and cents. But he isn't counting the costs in the terms of money. The farm is a hobby and like most hobbies of rich men, it's a liability from the viewpoint of the auditor.

3 THREE-LETTER MEN AT ALBION COLLEGE LIKELY

For the first time in a decade, Albion college has the prospect of having three three-letter men in one year.

This will eventuate if Harry Goldberg and Eddie Carlson of Cleveland and Ernie Gray of Pontiac, succeed and are awarded their base ball emblems. The trio of athletes has won the awards in both foot ball and basket ball and should have a good chance to come through in the diamond sport. Goldberg, a pitcher, also may try for the infield. Gray is a first baseman and Carlson a short stop.

Howard Kenega, of Royal Oak, was the only Albion athlete who won three letters last year. He now is attending medical college.

HORSES GIVE WAY TO AUTO EVEN IN LAND OF SNOWS

Horses, which once played so important a part in the clearing of Manistee acres and the hauling of logs to the skidways on the streams, fast are becoming extinct in the county. They may still be seen on the smaller farms in summer months pulling the plow, but their place on the highways has been usurped by the passenger automobile and truck, even in the winter time.

There was a time when Dobbin came into his own each winter when high drifts made it impossible to traverse the roads in wheel vehicles. Now the judicious use of snow fence and constant plowing make the highways passable the year around, as is evidenced by a count of traffic on M-11 and M-22 for two days.

This count revealed that there were 41 horse drawn vehicles as compared with 115 trucks and 1103 other automobiles for the same period. Only the by-roads well off the beaten path might give the ordinary flivver some trouble now.

The Michigan Business Farmer has set aside ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS ($1,000.00) to be paid in rewards to anyone, including state and county police officers, who secures the evidence and conviction of poultry thieves who steal chickens, ducks, turkeys or guinea fowl from its subscribers.

Let The Facts Speak

In the contest between the wets and drys, the conditions are very similar to those of political campaigns when propaganda is likely to be confused with facts. Propaganda has put doubts in the minds of many as to the effectiveness of the dry law. Facts will clear away these doubts, and bring sound conclusions. Here are a few facts.

The U. S. Census Bulletin 8-550 3A, shows that crime has decreased 37.7 per cent in 1926, as compared to 1910; commitments to prison for drunkenness have decreased 55.3 percent; deaths from alcoholism was 3300 persons less per year in the six dry years as compared with six wet years. Salvation Army drink cases have reduced from fifty percent of the total to one percent. Only six of nearly one hundred college publication editors report an increase in drinking among students and young people generally, while 213 college presidents reported less drinking. Application to the Salvation Army for relief has reduced fifty percent during prohibition.

Salvation Army reports homes better furnished, children better clothed, and sanitary and health conditions improved. The Girard Trust Company reports that since 1920 the number of bank depositors have increased 23,000,000; the amount in saving banks has increased eight billion dollars, and life insurance in force, thirty seven billion dollars.

One should concede that this is satisfactory progress in the six chaotic years during which prohibition has existed, two of which were of serious depression. Those of conservative thought believe that the effects of the dry law will be progressive, and that its full benefits may not be felt for a generation. Why modify a law which is making progress contrary to the propaganda of the opposition?—Michigan Farmer.

Farm Bureau Legislative News

The President's attitude toward the McNary Haugen bill has a tendency to show that his interests are more in sympathy with that of the manufacturers than that of the farmers. Let's get behind the Farm Bureau and see if we can't change his attitude at the next session of Congress as not enough votes can be mustered to override his veto at this session but each year we are gaining.

If you are in favor of any of the following bills write your Rep. Denis Clancy. He will be glad to get your opinions for you are the one he serves.

The electric chair bill has now been sent to the Senate where it is prophesied it will find an almost equal number of supporters and opponents.

Two less discussed bills aimed at lessening Michigan's crime wave were passed unanimously by the Senate at its Monday evening session. One of them is sponsored by Sen. Herbert J. Rushton of Escanaba and makes life imprisonment mandatory for persons convicted of assaulting another with intent to rob or steal while armed with any dangerous weapon. The companion bill would forbid the parole of prisoners convicted of first degree murder. It was introduced by Sen. Seth Q. Pulver of Owosso.

The powerful Finance and Appropriations committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means committee of the House are confronted with staggering appropriation requests, which if they were all granted would materially increase the state tax. The report is that many of the appropriations passed by the Legislature two years ago were not carried out and hence many state institutions are said to be in a deplorable condition.

An influential group of legislative leaders are supporting a program which is in complete accord with the resolution on this subject adopted at the recent annual meeting of the Michigan State Farm Bureau. In brief, this plan would provide for a 4 cent gas tax, Permanent licenses for passenger cars and an annual weight tax for trucks and busses. A further feature of this plan provides that the counties should receive at least eight million dollars. annually of the State highway revenue instead o six million dollars as at present.

While the Town and Stranch bills which embody the above program would leave the rate of the annual weight tax for commercial vehicles the same as at present, the sponsors of this legislation are said to be considering seriously an effort to materially decrease the license rate on light trucks.

In order that this whole proposition of how highway funds are to be raised and distributed may be thoroughly discussed, the Roads and Bridges committee of the House announced a public hearing on the various pending proposals to be held Thursday evening, March 3.

School directors who wanted to repair the stove or put in a new furnace could do so without consulting the State Department of Public Instruction and obtaining official permission according to the terms of a bill introduced in the House by Rep. Denis G. Clancy of Hillsdale. In many rural communities in Michigan this question of heating equipment for schools is certainly red hot and there is every indication that Rep. Clancy's proposal will stir up some warm discussions and considerable feeling.

Compulsory religious exercises for all public schools in the state would be provided by a bill introduced in the House by Rep. Ate Dykstra of Grand Rapids. This bill begins, "Religion and morality being necessary to good government and happiness of mankind, a short portion from any widely accepted version of the Bible shall be read daily in each public school" The bill would forbid any comment on the Scripture so read and would require the repeating of the Lord's Prayer by the students.

SAW CHARGE OF "SIX HUNDRED"

Veteran Fighter Rounds Out Eventful Life in Quiet Retreat

Captain Walpole Roland, campaigner in half a dozen wars, celebrated his hundredth birthday recently in St. Joseph's Home for the Aged, operated by the Little Sisters of the Poor, in Detroit. Captain Roland was honored by the Veterans of the Foreign Wars who decorated him with the honorary medal of the Veterans.

When a young officer, Capt. Roland stood on a hill and watched the famed charge of the Light Brigade during the Crimean War. At that time he was attached to the Turkish Army as military advisor. He was born in Roorkee, India, the son of Col. Walpole Roland, of the British forces. He has seen service under five flags, in the Crimea, India, China, the United States and Mexico.

Graduating from the Royal Military College, at London, Capt. Roland went to a military school in Saxony, where one of the instructors was a son-in-law of Omar Pasha. With a little persuasion Roland was induced to join the Turks. He served through the Crimean conflict and fought at Balaklava, where the Light Brigade made its famous charge, at Alma, Inkermann and at the seige of Sebastopol. He fought in Persia and then went to India, where he aided in the supression of the Indian mutiny, in 1857.

In China he served during the Boxer uprising under "Chinese" Gordon at Taku Forts and the Seige of Pekin. During the civil war, in the United States Capt. Roland was commissioned in the Union army and served under Custer; Meade at Gettysburg; and Grant at Petersburg. At the close of the war he sailed for Vera Cruz, where he joined the Bonapartists.

In 1898 he was refused by the United States army but in the World War he served as an inspector of supplies in Pittsburgh, although 90 years of age. His experiences he has recorded in his book "Under Five Flags". When not fighting, Capt. Roland followed his profession of mining engineer and has prospected all through the west and Canadian northwest.

Sheriff's Report For The Week Ending Feb. 26th

The Sheriff was in Toledo all day Tuesday, checking up the statements of a man held on suspicion.

Geo. Weller of Jackson, formerly ot Hillsdale, called at 4 a. m. Tuesday and complained of being shot at and wounded. He said he was in the vicinity of the Gas House, in an alley, when the shooting took place. His story didn't exactly coincide with the appearance of the wound, so the Sheriff locked him up. Weller claimed to have taken the gun which had been used against him and thrown it at his assailant. The Sheriff and Undersheriff, with flashlights, immediately examined carefully the place described by Weller, but nothing of interest could be found. Later in the day, Weller was taken to the scene of the alleged fray, and "found" the gun and shells some of which were soiled with blood. Weller's statements all the way thru were rather unsatisfactory, yet he was released, pending further investigation.

Arthur Chapman, Scipio Township, arrested last Friday on a drunk charge, and who was released on bail, was brought before a jury in Justice Fitzsimmon's Court. The complaining witness in the case failing to appear, the case was dismissed. Chapman was immediately re-arrested and charged with being drunk on the streets. Trial was set for March 4th, Released on bail of $100.

C. A. and C. E Halberg, of Chicago, were arrested in Jonesville Thursday by State Troopers. They were enroute from Detroit with 120 Quarts of Canadian Whiskey. C. E. was arraigned before Justice Aldrich, waived examination and was bound over to the Circuit Court under $1000 bail, for possession and transportation of liquor. C. A. was arraigned before Justice Aldrich, charged with carrying concealed weapons, waived examination, and was bound over to the Circuit Court, Bail was not furnished in either case.

A "hurry up" call at 3 a. m. Thursday from residents near the Alamo Engine Co. brought the officers out in a hurry, and back again the same way. A Detroit car which drove up, and turned around and was waiting for the plant to open in order to obtain goods, etc. was the innocent cause of the disturbance.

Floyd Parks, arrested on the 18th on a disorderly charge, (having stolen goods in his possession), was brought before a jury in Justice Fitzsimmon's Court on Thursday. During the progress of the trial, Parks changed his plea to guilty and was sentenced to 30 days in jail. We will hear more about Parks and Derby later, we hope.

Geo. W. Nelson, Montgomery, was arraigned before Justice Fitzsimmon's charged with violating the Motor Laws. (Operating with old license plates) He was fined $10 and costs.

Two cars reported stolen which may appear in Hillsdale Co. Let's watch for Ohio license 1927 No. 142,050, on a Ford, and a Chevrolet Sedan with Michigan 1927 plates No. 530,789. Remember these numbers and if you see them call the nearest officer.

Clayton Parmelee, of Ransom Township reported the theft of his Ford Roadster from Hillsdale, Saturday night. The car was located east of town, Sunday morning, almost completely stripped.

Don't forget those tail lights. A new bulb at the garage costs 20c. When purchased through the Courts, it costs about $20.

The Sheriff is charged with "Wet weather overloading." Watch your load. 450 lbs per inch of tire width, and no load over 6,000 lbs.

We will begin to weigh trucks on Monday the 28th. The only road excepted will be M 23, east of Jonesville.

No. of prisoners in the County Jail 7.

Col. E. H. Kerr, Sheriff.

No Lobbyists Allowed

The legislators at Lansing have decided that hereafter no lobbying will be allowed on the floor of the house, and all the buttonholers can do is to stand in the galleries and watch what goes on below. This applies to the farmers as well as all others and taken all in all it is rather drastic, inasmuch as things have been going high, wide and loose around the capitol for some years.

Just how the moneyed powers will get around this law nobody knows but we'll wager a peck of peanuts against a doughnut some method will be dug up to get by. These law makers have done this more especially to satisfy Governor Green than for any other cause. Green would like to have the people of Michigan think he is going to clean up the whole mess of politics and renovate the capitol. Here's hoping he means it in every sense of the word. Some young and sporty legislator has made a motion that the marriage law be amended slightly in regard to getting licenses five days previous to the ceremony. He wants it striken out so that suffering young couples can be united at once as soon as they make up their minds. We thought all the time that this law was unjust. The poor young things should not be unduly tortured. There is another angle to the situation however, and that is the ministers and sky pilots around the state are putting up objections as it interferes with their business awfully. Couples come up here wanting to get married in a hurry, They come from Ohio and Indiana where the laws are not half so gentle and tasty as they are here, and they want to find a Dominie and get hooked and get back home for breakfast, so as not to lose any time, but the nasty old five day law sticks in its nose and forbids. Away with it. Let there be no ruling interfering with the happiness of these Janes and Joshes.

Mr. Ford Thinks Capital Punishment Useless

The following excerpts are taken from a recent editorial in the Dearborn Independet Henry Ford's paper concerning capital punishment in Michigan and we like to quote authorities who are known the world over: "Killing a man is the most useless thing that can be done with him. That is the attitude of this page toward the proposal to restore capital punishment. To stop killing by killing is not to stop it at all, but only to multiply it. Justice is not established by killing a murderer; it is a force that is thus established. There is however, an approximation of justice in compelling him for the rest of his life to take up as far as he can the responsibilities of the one he killed—to labor for the support of his victim's dependents, if any, or to mend as far as discipline and labor can mend the rest which his lawless deed has torn in the fabric of society. It does no good to the criminal to kill him and it does no good to society. A society that turns to rope or gas or electric chair to solve its problem is simply dodging them. Society can not be rid of its mistakes by killing them. "A life for a life" is an excellent rule, but it does not mean a death for a death.

None of the arguments offered in favor of capital punishment are found to be provable in experience In some places where capital punishment exists there also exists a high crime rate and in some cases where capital punishment does not exist, there is a notable freedom from crime. On the other hand there are other countries where capital punishment is practiced that life and property is secure and they are famous for this fact. Crime seems to bear no relationship to capital punishment,"

A Great Merger

We understand the Consumers Power Company and the Detroit Edison Company two giant organizations furnishing electric juice to southern Michigan have at last got married so to speak and each will work for the benefit of the other. This means we suppose that if the current on our lines from Jackson should fail for any unforseen reason, the Edison company will be standing by, all ready to supply the deficiency.

The Edison company have at present enormous plants steam driven in Detroit and of course they cannot make the juice as cheaply as the Consumers with their hundreds of hydro electric stations throughout the state. This is fast becoming an electric age. The average farmer in the country-side enjoys the use of this unseen giant to-day much more than the average city dweller did ten years ago. He arises in the morning at 4:00 by the light of electricity; he goes to the barn in the darkness by a shimmering path lit by electricity. He touches a button and Presto the whole barn is one glare of light from top to bottom. He has sometime before touched a button at the head of his bed whereby the poultry house has shimmered in a beautiful light which completely fools the poor "biddies" into thinking it is time to arise and they at once began laying eggs for the market He waters the horses by means of water pumped by electricity; he shells a little corn for the sheep by the same means, by this time he has the stables cleaned the electric milking machine has pailed the cows and being daylight he switches off the current and goes to the house where the hired girl has already cooked breakfast by means of the electric range. He steps to the sink and touches a button directly a stream gushes forth from his electric pump in the cellar. He scrubs his blooming countenance and sets down to the table while the electric radio from WLS gives him the latest stock markets, after breakfast he telephones to Neighbor Bill Johnson to come over and buzz wood today, incidentally the saw is run by a five horse power motor. Just before going out he remembers the furnace needs cleaning out or at least it did before he got the oil-o-matic which is controlled by electricity. Meantime the work in the house is going on merrily. The hired girl plans to clean the up stairs rooms by means of the electric vacuum cleaner; the cream must be separated by the same power, a large washing will be on the line by ten o'clock for it is Monday. The washer of course run by electricity, wife must finish the new dress for Caroline's party today so she just sits at the machine without a sign of a treadle, it also runs by motor. This accomplished she must iron a large batch by the electric iron. In the kitchen the hired girl sings merrily while the electric dishwasher does it task, and by noon the farmer has sufficient wood buzzed to last the rest of the winter. In the afternoon some feed must be ground, the hay knife sharpened on the emery grinder and a lot of feed chopped up for the cows balanced ration. All this is accomplished with the electric current. By this time the short day is about ended and lights are again switched on in the big barn while the evening chores are being attended to. The milker again functions, the day is past and after an enjoyable concert over the air by electricity the farmer retires with visions of another day's work which he knows will be just play because he has drafted this unseen giant into service.

Incubating the Vacuum Tube

Out of the Ceaseless Efforts of Scientists and Research Engineers Must Come the Improvements That Make the Modern Vacuum Tube What It Is.

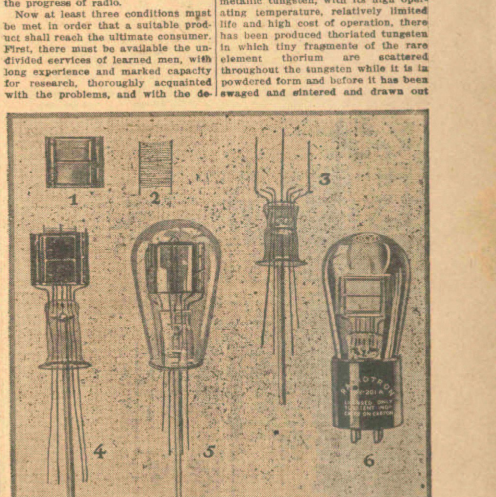
By DR. ALFRED N. GOLDSMITH

Chief Broadcast Engineer, Radio Corporation of America.

Dr. A. N. Goldsmith

It is said that every bridge exists first in the mind of the civil engineer before it is flung across the river. Likewise, a skyscraper exists in the mind of its architect long before the site is cleared and the caissons are driven down to bedreck. Again, every great painting or statue is conceived in its ideal perfection by the artist's fertile mind long before it is realized in material form. And so it is with radio—an achievement in practical form never comes until long after patient and inspired scientists and research engineers have dreamt of new physical principles and methods, followed by tireless experimenting until, despite all discouragements, they have achieved the chosen goal of a newer and a better way of accomplishing that which is most needed in the progress of radio.

Now at least three conditions must be met in order that a suitable product shall reach the ultimate consumer. First, there must be available the undivided services of learned men, with long experience and marked capacity for research, thoroughly acquainted with the problems, and with the determination, knowledge and inspiration to develop new things and methods. But even the great scientists cannot make bricks without straw. They require elaborate facilities in the way of apparatus and assistants, so that the second point is the material, as the French would say, quite as much as the personnel. Thirdly, there is need for the co-ordination of all research and developmental efforts with those of production which must follow for a successful consummation of the process. In this connection be it noted that so vast is the scope of modern science that no one can do more than to polish one facet of the diamond of scientific knowledge. Left to themselves, the labors of many qualified scientists might be lost either through needless and exasperating duplication of efforts on the same problem or through the failure so to co-ordinate their activities so as to cover every portion of the field and to explore every nook and cranny of the unsolved problems.



Six Steps in the Manufacture of Radiotron UV-201A

Organized Scientific Research

It is just here that the great industrial organizations come into their own in the field of applied science. It is in this connection that these great organizations can render a real service to society. These huge organizations, because of the very magnitude of their operations, can afford to provide elaborate facilities, can place problems before leading scientists, can assign each task to the right man, can co-ordinate efforts so that all parts of a given problem will be covered with the simultaneous and co-ordinated efforts of specialists. What is still more significant, these great industrial organizations can afford to continue year after year, despite discouragements, setbacks and long and costly delays, until the final outcome, be it successful or otherwise. Smaller organizations obviously cannot afford to stand the gruelling tests of patience, with its terrific cost which is part and parcel of pioneer development.

Now in no other portion of the field of radio are research and development so important as in the radiotron or vacuum tube. Consider, for example, the work of Dr. Irving Langmuir, who is known throughout the world for his scientific achievements. You are not likely to find Dr. Langmuir in his Schenectady research laboratory placing vacuum tubes in a receiving set nor again studying the characteristics others must go those practical tasks—tasks far down the long line of research and development. It is more probable that you will find Dr. Langmuir studying a new piece of apparatus for investigating the behavior of the invisible electron, the atom or even larger molecule, or again of films of oil floating on the surface of water, or still again the physical behavior of elaborate chemical compounds, or once more the nature of light emitted by some glowing vapor. These and many other apparently academic subjects—academic today, practical tomorrow—are most likely to call for the attention and interest of this great scientist. Yet in time these seemingly abstract studies become important features of your vacuum tubes or radiotrons and provide for still better radio results.

An "Electric Sponge"

Turning from the general to the specific, there is the dry battery radiotron. The filament of this tube as well as that of the leading storage battery tubes, is based upon what might logically be termed an electric sponge. Instead of chemically pure metallic tungsten, with its high operating temperature, relatively limited life and high cost of operation, there has been produced thoriated tungsten in which tiny fragments of the rare element thorium are scattered throughout the tungsten while it is in powdered form and before it has been swaged and sintered and drawn out into filament wire one-half a thousandth of an inch in diameter.

Now thorium has the peculiar property when heated of pouring forth a flood of electrical particles or electrons. It is, however, mechanically unsuited for filament use by itself. It would melt too easily for one thing. However, by placing the thorium in diffused form in the tungsten a filament of better mechanical and thermal properties is obtained while still retaining the electronic proclivities of thorium.

Radiotron Standard Tube

The thorium in the thoriated tungsten filament forms a layer of really unimaginable thinness on the filament. This layer or film is very quickly driven off, but the heat just as quickly boils out fresh thorium to the surface, there to form a fresh coating. And so it goes. The action is much like that of a sponge soaked with water which, reaching the surface, evaporates by the heat of the sun, yet the sponge all the while is being squeezed just enough to keep the surface constantly moistened with a fresh supply of water.

There is much that the present day vacuum tube owes to Dr. Irving Langmuir, as well as other scientists and research engineers who work in research laboratories devoted to vacuum tube development. It was Dr. Langmuir who in the course of his investigations of the so-called "Edison effect" in incandescent lamps found that as the vacuum was made higher and higher the available electronic emission from the hot filament became steadily greater until finally when a vacuum tube was immersed in liquid air giving an extremely high vacuum the emission was ten thousand times its original value. This was an astonishing result, but when the experiments were repeated with another lot of filament wire no such increase in emission developed.

In conclusion, it is evident that the really good vacuum tube has a pedigree that extends back to the research laboratory. It has been fathered by scientists of note. Its infancy has been spent in the laboratory; its childhood has been passed in the testing laboratory at the hands of none too kind skeptics; its youth has been devoted to production in the largest tube factories in the world, and in its prime of life it is ready to render the service which will bring credit to its

CHAPTER FIFTY-THREE

Scott hesitated a moment, growled something inarticulate, and followed her, slamming the door behind him. She led the way to the far end of the tarrace, aloof from the house and her waiting car, where she faced him, pale but steady.

"Celia's with me."

"Where?"

"Where she has been ever since I took her away from here, and where all your detectives can't find her."

"You seem to know they're after her."

"Sometimes I read the newspapers," she mentioned, and he winced.

"That's that damn fool Nixon's doings. He advertised it. But I'll get even with him."

"You have nothing to get even with him for, except his strenuous efforts to lnd me and make me bring Celia back.

"He knew where you were all the time. I haven't been fooled. He helped you and got caught himself. You're here now because he's scared."

A cynical little smile curved her lips. He's scared, certainly. But perhaps that's not suprising. It would scare almost any man to face ruin for something he hadn't done."

"Yes, I met Clif just now at the foot of the hill—for the first time in a year and a half—and he told me." The smile lingered. "He was to have met me in New York, but he didn't."

Scott nodded. "I saw to that."

"I'm really glad you did, because if he had met me everything would have been different."

"Different? How? What do you metn?"

"Clif must have been scared even then, because when he couldn't meet me himself, he sent a man to tell me that I mustn't on any account try to see Celia. He knew I wanted to, but he said the consequenses would be very serious if I did. That's the reason he was so bent on finding me before I saw her, and the reason he came up here. He thought I might be here, and he wanted to stop me."

"Why didn't he then?"

"He couldn't find me. He hasn't seen me since he was in Paris, a year ago last spring, until we met by accident just now on the road. He hadn't the remotest idea where I was, and he knew no more about Celia's disappearance than you did."

"H'm." Scott scrutinized her keenly and she looked back at him, clear-eyed. "Are you telling me the truth?"

"I am. Whatever else you can say about me, I've never lied to you. Clif's been on your side all through this—and is yet."

"He'd better be!"

"He is. I'd have been here a little earlier if he hadn't kept me, trying to make me promise to bring Celia back."

"And you wouldn't, eh? Well, you will."

"She's not coming back—ever."

Yiu haven't married her to that damn Frenchman!"

"Oh no. She's too young to marry. She wants to go to college fiirst. But she's not coming back here."

"Isn't, eh?" His dark flush deepened. "We'll see about that. I've got you now, and you'd produce her, or—" He paused threateningly.

"Or what?" she asked, with unbroken composure.

"Or take the consequenses!"

"Consequences of what? You haven't an ounce of proof that I know where she is."

"You admitted it."

"Not before witnesses," she reminded him. "You have no proof whatever that I've been near Birchwood for three years—until today."

He took a step aoward her, clenching his fists. "I'll have you followed. I'll find that girl and bring her back, if it takes a year."

"It won't. You can find her easily enough, after tomorrow. She'll be with me, and we're not going to hide any more. But if you take her away from me, I'll do what I should have done in the first place. I'll apply for a writ of habeas corpus and prove in court that you're not a fit person to have charge of her."

"Not fit! To control my own daughter?"

"You've threatened and intimated her. You've kept her under guard for months and circulated a report that her mind was ogected. That can be proved. She says you told her she was mentally incompetent and that you'd keep her here until she was of age and then put her in a sanitarium, unless she'd promise to obey you absolutely. That's cruelty."

"It's nothing of the sort!"

"All right." Roberta's tone was cold. "Shall we leave it to the court?"

"You little devil!" said Scott ferociously. "Who put you up to this?"

"A man who knows the law."

"You wouldn't dare do it."

"Try me, if you like. I'm not afraid of you—and I love Celia."

"By God, I won't have it!" he cried, beside himself with fury. "My own flesh and blood! You're mine, too, even if you are unnatural, and I'll keep you here until I bring you to your senses. You'll tell me where she is!"

Don't shout, father. The chauffeur over there is a witness. You can't do anything to me. I prepared for that. Several men knew I came here, and why. If I'm not back when I'm expected they'll take steps—legal steps, if necessary—to find me."

"Who are they? Who's behind you in all this? You never did it alone."

"No, I couldn't have done it alone. A man whom neither you nor Clif knows helped me take Celia away, and I got legal advice in Boston this morning."

"I'll find out who he is! I'll get him!"

"That's another thing." Roberta's voice was still steady, but she was deadly pale. "If you don't call og your detectives immediately and drop this whole matter—if I ecer learn that you've taken one more step toward investigating any of it, or that you've hounded the man who helped me—I'll give the whole story to the newspapers, including your treatment of Celia and my reasons for taking her away."

Scott started, somewhat daunted, but too enraged to weigh his words. "Tell it, then! Publish it, if you have no shame!"

"The shame wouldn't be mine. Any court and any public would uphold me. Are you willing to appear in headlines as a cruel father? Willing to have men point you out and whisper about you? As you say yourself sometimes, think it over."

Aghast at the picture she evoked, he read determination in her face and knew himself beaten. His great shoulders sagged. Suddenly Roberta was sorry for him, even while she gave thanks to the man who had pointed out to her that of all the weapons at her hand, the treat of publicity was the keenest, the one from which her father would most surely shrink.

"I'd rather not do that," she said gently, "but I will, if you make it necessary."

He knew that she would, too. Her stability had been proved.

"My own flesh and blood," he mumbled incredulously. "You must be crazy!"

"If either of us is unbalanced, it's you," she returned, quietly using another suggestion supplied by her shrewd coach. "Perhaps that's the kindest thing for us to think—Celia and me."

"You're both unnatural."

"We're partly what you made us, I suppose. We'd have liked to be friends with you—we'd like to still, if you—if you'd let us. Will you?"

"Friends! I'm your father!"

"Yes, you're my father, but we'd both like you be our friend, too. Will you?"

CHAPTER FIFTY-FOUR

Friendliness was not in Scott at that moment. He motioned to her to leave him, but she lingered, asking: "When will you dismiss the detectives, so we can go to New York without being arrested?"

"Right away. I'm done."

"Then we'd better tell the same story. Celia ran away to see me. Everybody knows now that you and I have not been on good terms, which will explain that well enough. We've been staying at a remote little place in the country, and didn't see any newspapers until this morning. Then I came straight to you. That's perfectly true."

"It doesn't explain the fire."

"People will forget about the fire when they find she wasn't kidnapped. Clif said he heard a whistle like a signal, and they may think somebody did try to burn the barn and that Celia took advantage of the confusion to run away. But Clif ought not to sufferfor what he did his very best to prevent."

"I'll see to that."

"Thank you. Then—good-by."

He responded only with a gesture and she turned toward the car. As she drove away, her father went slowly into the house to telephone to the detectives that his daughter was found.

Considerably later, determined to clear the slate in one day and get it over, he sent for Clifford Nixon, who answered the summons promptly, divided between curiosity and tradition.

"I guess I've been mistaken about you, Cliff," Scott began, with a mighty effort. "Roberta says somebody else helped her. Sorry."

"Did she tell you who it was?"

"No, I don't care who it was, as long as it wasn't you." He still hoped to conceal his scars from other men. "I've dropped the whole thing."

Nixon took a long breath before he ventured: "I—I'm still going to marry her, you know."

"All right," said her father. "Marry her and be damned to you! It's none of my business when you marry. My stock in your concern's for sale. Know nothing about who wants it?"

Which, when you think of it, was quite a step for R. K. Scott, whose nickname was G. A.

Celia was distraught. She wept copiously at frequent intervals throughout the day, calling upon Janet to tell her why and when and how Roberta had gone, and what was to become of them now. The morbidity of sensitive and alarmed youth combined with long nervous strain to make her desperate, and a lively appreciation of her father's rthulessness increased her forboding.

Did Janet think he had somehow got hold of Roberta? If not, why didn't she come back? How could she come back, with those horrid detectives watching? How had she avoided the men when she went away? Had they caught her? What would they do to her, if they had? How could the rest of them hope to escape, if Roberta had been captured? Didn't Peter know anything about it? Why didn't he come and tell her what he thought and what they were to do now? Didn't he realize how terrible it was? And it was all her fault. They never would have been in this frifihtful position, except for her. She was the most miserable creature in the world. Where was Peter? Why didn't he do something? Wasn't the anything they could do to find Roberta?

At length even Scottish granite yielded to the constantly falling drop, and Piggy, restlessly pacing behind the house, was summoned to exercise expert phychological engineering in an effort to patch the leak in Celia's reservoir of courage—a task for which he had small appetite, but Janet said that personally she'd had all she could thole, and was gey fasht' wi' the last.

When Celia learned that she was expected to impersonate the late Mrs. Smith ina night attempt to run the blockade, the floodgates opened wide, and the preceding dissonsolate dribble became as nothing in the torrent of tears, fears, and reproaches converting into a whirlpool the already deep waters in which Percival Galahad was submerged. But rock bottom is rock bottom and he could sink no longer. He gritted his teeth, mentally anathematizing girls in general—except one— and emotional young girls in particular, until the first rush of remonstrate had exhausted itself somewhat, giving him opportunity to be heard.

"Now listen, kid," he said patiently. After all, she was Bob's sister, and Bob, for some inexplicable reason, was fond of her and wanted her. Therefore she should have her. "It's the only way. We've got to get out of here and get out quick."

"But suppose Roberta comes back after we're gone?"

"We'll leavce a note for her, in cipher, telling her where to find us."

"But the detectives may catch her—they may catch us, if we go—and. anyway, we can't desert Roberta like that. No! No!"

"We've got to get out," he repeated, and told her of Nixon's danger, together with his own plan for averting it.

Then Celia had her heroic moment.

"I'll go back. Everybody's in trouble because of me, and that would settle it all. I'll go back and give up. I'll tell father Clif had nothing to do with it. He can do anything he likes to me."

Her tone was dull but determined, and a gleam of admiration came into Piggy's eyes as he explained gruffly:

"You can't do that, for a lot of reasons. I'm in this, too, and—my father. That's a long story—it's all about business—and doesn't concern you, except that we've got to prevent anybody's finding out obaut my part in this."

"I won't tell. He can trouble me and I won't tell."

"Besides, O promised Bob I'd get you away, and I'm going to do it. We'll go tonight."

Celia balked. She would cut the Gordian knot by returning alone to Birchwood and taking the consequences, or she would remain hidden at Fitzwilliam until Roberta came back or they were captured, but not one step would she stir toward New York and freedom, without her sister. In vain Piggy argued and pleaded and commanded; in vain Janet added her voice, urging that the lad knew what was best. Celia was like a wet sponge, oozing tears when she was pressed, but instantly regaining her natural form when the weight of their words was removed. She would give herself up and relieve everybody else of danger, or she would stay where she was.

Eventually Piggy withdrew, his one last hope fustrated by a girl's passive but stubborn resistance. The debacle was complete.

He went to the barn, partly to get away from the house and all feminine association; partly to rack his brain in solitude for any untried line of reasoning or persuasion that might move Celia. Perfunctorily he looked the car over, testing this and examining that, on the remote possibility that the girl could be induced to make the run to New York.

Presently he heard a boy's voice calling from a distance, "Hey! Jaffrey wants you on the phone," and through a chink in the door he saw one of the detectives hasten away toward the tavern, whence the messenger had come. Was the end at hand? Would it be arrest and discovery? With palpitating heart he waited for what seemed a long time. Finally the man returned, spoke briefly to his colleague, and after looking at the house a moment in apparent indecision the two departed.

"Well, what do you know about that?" said Percival Galahad aloud to the surrounding void. "What—the—devil!"

CHAPTER FIFTY-FIVE

Nothing more happened; the men did not return. He waited half an hour and then reconnoitered cautiously down the lane. Discovering no ambush and no pikets, he went on to the tavern, hoping to learn whether anyone else knew "what about that." There he heard news that took his breath away and all but led him to betray himself.

The detectives had been recalled by their superior at Jaffery; the Scott girl had been found.

"Found!" Piggy ejacuated. "Where?"

"Dunno," said his informant. 'I suppose it'll all come out in the papers. All I know is that they've found her."

"Well, it's about time!" the chauffeur commended, struggling back with difficulty into the character of Peter Brown. "Worryin' the life out of a poor little widow lady that never did anybody no harm! Maybe we can get away from this darn place now without a string o' sleuths trailin' us. I'll go tell Mrs. Smith."

With that he fled, more at a loss than ever, if that were possible. Obviously something had happened—but what? Had Roberta confessed to Nixon? Would they come quietly to take Celia away? How had they placated Scott and induced him to withtdraw the deteceives Or had they? Had Roberta convinced some distant setinel that she herself was Celia? Was this a ruse on her part to enable them to escape unwatched? What was expected of him in this emergency? Should he seixe the moment to shake the dust of Fitzwilliam from his speeding tires, telling Celia that her sister would meet them in New York? Or should he wait here for further developments?

When Celia heard the news she executed an astounding volte-face, presenting on the instant a jubilant countenance wreathed in smiles. But she still refused to consider immediate departure. She said Roberta had done something to get the detectives away and now she could back herself. They would wait for Roberta.

Piggy then called a mass-meeting, pointing out to the two women that conceivably something had been left to their united intelligence and that opportunity was notoriously averse to knocking twice at any door. They were still in conference, Janet, wearied of emotional upheaval, inclining toward flight while flight was possible, -;tawoi t.are?a ar- vfw? aHsoweh when they were interrupted by an audible and physical knocking at their material door.

"There she is!" Celia cried, hobbling to the head of the stairs as Janet scurried down. "That's Roberta now."

But it was only the messenger from the tavern again, this time with a telegram from Mrs. Horatio Smith, relayed by telephone from Keene, where it had been received, Fitzwilliam having no telegraph office. Piggy read it aloud.

"Meet me Springfield tonight without fail. Important business.

BOB."

"Springfield! That's about a hundred miles. We can make it!" Celia exclaimed. "Oh, hurry, Peter! Hurry!"

Piggy stood staring at the slip of paper. "It was sent from Boston this afternoon. She couldn't do anything about this in Boston. It may be a trick."

It was a trick, and he had yet to learn that there are more devices in heaven and earth than even his elastic ingenuity had encompassed.

Half an hour later the touring car of Mr. Horatio Smith rolled oft of Fitzwilliam for the last time, pausing only at the tavern to leave the key of the relinquished house and receive the proprietor's regrets that circum- hort stay so [illegible] stances had rendered the widow's short stay so unpleasant. He said afterward to all and sundry that the poor thing seemed too broken up to talk much, and that evidently the affair had made her very ill. Even her voice was changed.

Mrs. Smith sat alone in the tonneau, concealing radiant smiles behind her heavy crepe veil. Janet, erect and austerely respectable, was beside Peter Brown, and neither of them had difficulty in maintaining a suitable gravity. The old Scotchwoman's heart was heavy for her lad, bereft of his patrimony and his father's love. She blamed herself harshly for aiding him in the madness that had brought this to pass.

Piggy's one point of relief lay in Celia's apartment salety, though even that seemed doubtful. He held a lark suspicion that they had been tolled away to enable Scott to make his capture without publicity. Only the fact that the telegram had been signed "Bob" had persuaded him that Roberta could have had any part in sending it. He didn't see how anybody else could know his name for her.

His name—and at that the waters of March surged over and through him, his inmost being partaking of their bitterness. He had lost everything for Bob, and she had gone to Nixon—Nixon, whom she had intended from the first to marry, to whom her loyal heart was pledged. Te had never had even a chance; not the slightest right to love her, even if in his luncay he had not forever estranged her. Dad was right. He was a fool and a failure. Celia's buoyancy, evidenced by giggles and ejaculations from the back seat, had no power to lift him. He was held to rock bottom, and from that depth he drove the hundred miles to Springfield, automatically observing the rules of the road, to stop in due time before the door of the city's principal hotel.

A heavy built, elderly man, with a large nose and a short gray mustache, who had been standing for two hours in the doorway, anxiously watching arrivals, sprang forward and caught Mrs. Smith's chauffeur by the shoulders before the preoccupied young person could open the door of the tonneau.

"Son! Boy!"

"Dad!"

Their hands met in a tight grip and the eyes of both were wet. Piggy spoke first, gaspingly.

"Why—why, dad!"

"Steady, Boy," said his father. "Hello, Janet! There's a room engaged for you." Turning to the amazed Celia, he added: "Your sister's waiting for you up stairs. Son, run your car down there and leave it. Hurry up! Get a move on!"

Dazed, Piggy obeyed, his parent keeping alongside as if afraid to let him get out of reach. The women were left to the ministrations of a bell-ooy.

When he had parked the car, Piggy stepped out and stood still, looking at the other.

"What—how on earth—"

"Boy, I've been an infernal old fool, and it took that little spitdre to make me see it. Are you—will you—" Voice failing, he held out his hand and again his son gripped it.

"Sure. That—that's all right, dad. But I don't—How do you come—"

"Tell you all about that upstairs. Long story. Bring your bag up to my room and get out of that damned livery."

For once in his life Percival Galahad was too bewildered to act. Brazenose gasped his arm, steering him through the doorway into the hotel office, where he recovered sufficient presence of mind to identify his bags. Silently, side by side, they stood in the elevator, the father's hand resting on the shoulder of his only son, who had been lost and was found again. In silence they walked down the hall to a door, which the elder unlocked and threw open.

Piggy closed it and backed up against it, feeling curiously shaky.

"Dad, for Heaven's sake—"

"Sit down, Boy. You look tired. Want a drink?"

Boy nodded, and his father produced a flask, from which he poured two generous potions.

"Here's to our bet-better acquaintance," he proposed, with an attempted facetiousness interrupted by a choke purely emotional in its source.

"Now tell me," said Piggy, setting down his glass.

"It was all that little whippet of a girl—Roberta Scott. She hunted me up in Boston—"

"How'd she get there?"

"Sneaked out of the house in the dark and across lots to some back road. Flagged a train. It takes more than a couple of detectives to hold that young woman."

Piggn nodded. "All right. Go on."

"Well, she found me. And then she told me in words of one syllable where to get off, and—well—I got off there. That's all."

(To be continued).

JERSEY BREEDERS COMPLAIN OF MILK SOLD MISBRANDED

Acting upon the complaint of Jersey cattle breeders, the State Bureau of Dairying has launched a state wide investigation to determine whether Holstein milk is being sold as Jersey milk by distributors in Michigan cities

Owners of Jersey cattle complained that the sale of milk, low in fat content, as Jersey milk, was injuring the reputation of their product. They said it was forming a wrong impression in the minds of consumers of the true quality and value of their product.

Complaint also has been voiced in some sections of the State against milk distributors advertising "Jersey milk" in bold letters upon their wagons, when they have little or no Jersey milk for sale. Some consumers, the Jersey men fear, may purchase milk from these distributors under the belief they are buying Jersey milk, thereby creating a false impression of the true value of pure, unadulterated Jersey milk.

State inspectors have been urged to examine the caps used on the bottles and if the words Jersey milk appear thereon, to make tests to determine whether the fat contents supports the label. Jersey milk tests above 4 per cent butter fat, while Holstein milk tests an average of 3.5 per cent.

Inspectors have found very little Holstein milk in bottles bearing Jersey milk caps, but they have found a number of distributors using Jersey milk advertising upon their wagons although they handle very little Jersey milk.

The inspectors also are investigating conditions at ice cream plants, checking the butter fat content and making bacterial counts.

POWER RAYS TAKE PLACE OF FAMED MANISTEE BEACON

A veteran watch dog of the sea has given way to a younger, healthier successor, when the old light house at Manistee was discontinued and a powerful beacon was established in a new steel turret at the end of the harbor piers. The lamps have been removed from the old one and now the building around which centered so much romance, such a deau historic, will be but the prosais dwelling of the light keeper and his family.

For sixty days the rays from the Manistee light have shown across the waters, apprising mariners of their position on the lake, guiding them in safety into port, marking a pathway across the pathless deep.

Strange tales it could tell—stories of heroism, tragedy, adventure, fearless battles with the elements, tricks of fate in ceaseless panorama. History has been made under its unfailing scrutiny. Industry teeming with action, has seen white winged schooners flying from Manistee port laden with lumber and salt. A new industrial era has brought steamers scurrying into port with pulpwood, coal and raw products, for the factories and mills now here, while the same ships have remained to take away the finished product into which this raw material is converted.

The original harbor project was started by the United States government in 1867, when the light house was built. Before that time the river was lined with slab piers and schooners and tugs entered it at their peril. The river flowed in a circuitous route to the north of the light house, which was completed in 1869. Two years later it was destroyed by the great fire which swept away practically all of the town, including saw mills and millions of feet of lumber and logs.

The light house was rebuilt in the same year and shortly afterward the channel was diverted to a new course to the south of the light house.

The new beacon light is many times brighter than the old, and can be seen over the big lake for 17 miles when the weather is clear.

BASS ABSENT WHEN ICE FISHERMEN LOWER LINES

Peering down through a hole in the ice with his spear poised for a quick stroke, the winter fisherman sees pike and pickerel, lake trout, perch and other species stealing shadow like through the deep water. But seldom, if ever, does he see a black bass, for the simple reason that the bass hibernates for the duration of the cold months.

In the South, large mouth bass some times attain a weight of 20 pounds, but in the North and in Michigan they rarely scale over six or seven pounds. In the warm water of Georgia or Louisiana, the bass do not find it necessary to spend their winters in a torpid state, consequently, they grow much larger.

Bass ordinarily spend their winters in rocky crevices, emerging shortly after the ice goes out in the spring. But some times they hibernate under a stump or in deep mud.

STUDENTS AT YPSI GRADE TEACHERS

Out in Ypsilanti the scholastic worm has turned.

The students have turned on the faculty after they had, since time immemorial, been graded and judged without retaliating, and graded their professors.

Usually a student knew his status. He still does. Few instructors leave him in the dark as to where he stands. Some students, as a matter of fact, learn quickly from teachers who speak emphatically, exactly where matters are. But where does the poor professor stand? What makes him tick? How does he "stack" with the undergraduates? That's the mystery that the student body at Michigan State Normal college has solved.

School is not punishment for the young men and young women at Ypsi Normal. They take matters seriously. The student body is, as a whole, industrious and serious, and it is the ambition of each student to go out into the world and hold the gun barrel while the young idea learns to hit somewhere near the bullseye.

A meeting of the student council was called. It was decided that teachers would be graded by a system of balloting, whereby each instructor would be marked with an A, B, C, D or E, according to his effectiveness as an instructor, and these marks or grades explained with terse, short criticisms of his work.

The ballots were ordered printed, and a week later were distributed with the students' copies of the Normal College News, the campus weekly.

The decision to grade the professors roused the campus. Between classes and after school little groups gathered here and there, on the walks, in classrooms, in the corridors, discussing this new departure and conjecturing its possible benefit to the school, the teacher, and the student.

Now, each of us retains the memory of a professor at school whom we either disliked wholeheartedly, or worshiped without limit. There is, in the life of almost every college student, at least one professor who moves him deeply to admiration and reverence. It may be that the admiration is caused by the personality of the man rather than his ability as a teacher, but it is safe to say that an incompetent instructor would not be the idol of his students.

Thus the usual procedure at school was reversed, and the students took a hand in weighing the value, knowledge, and effectiveness of their instructors. The value of these ballots, filled out in all seriousness, is indicated in the fact that 2,300 of them were distributed. When the returns are made known, they will be a rather fair évaluation of the worth of the instructor.

For the most part, students at Ypsi hold their instructors in high esteem, although they voted one man to be incompetent, giving him an almost unanimous grade of E.

YOUTH "STUNG" IN JEWEL ACTION

A young Aladdin from a farm near Houghton, Mich., rubbed the magic lamp in a Detroit genie's cave and saw his wishes materialize in a $2 watch. He is Robert Carlson, 19 years old.

The genie was a jewelry auctioneer. And the lamp smoked. The string of pearls and the wrist watch disappeared. And it was a cold evening in a strange city. Carlson went to the Police Headquarters to spend his Arabian night.

Carlson came to Detroit a week ago to find a job.

"I didn't find one, and my money was getting low, and I decided to go back home," Carlson told Detectives John Collin and Ben Wallentowicz. "I've got a girl in Houghton and I wanted to take her a present. I went into a place on Woodward avenue where they were auctioning off jewelry, and I thought I could get something nice for her for not very much money. I didn't have much.

"I bid on a wrist watch and a string of pearls for her and got them both for $10. They told me to get my receipt while they were wrapping them up. When I went back to the table with the receipt I didn't see anything of the pearls or the wrist watch, but they showed me a man's watch. They said it was a solid gold watch, and they offered it to me instead of the other things for $5 more. I gave them $5 and left."

Carlson had no money left and went to a second-hand store to pawn or sell his watch. The proprietor at first refused to buy it. Finally when Carlson protested that he was without funds the proprietor gave him $1.25. He learned later the watch was worth about $2.

Your Prosperity Hinges on the Prosperity of Your Home Town Merchant

WRITER 41 YEARS IN LIGHTHOUSE

For 41 years of the 83 years of her life, Mrs. Elizabeth Whitney Williams, widely known as the author of the Beaver Island and King Strang story, "The Child of the Sea," lived in a lighthouse. For most of these 41 years she was the only woman light keeper in the United States. Twelve of these years as light keeper, she spent on the scene of her famous story, Beaver Island, and during the other 29 years she was in charge of the Little Traverse light house at Harbor Point.

"And what a wonderful life I've had! It has been wonderful because most of it was spent near the water.'

Mrs. Williams was born on Mackinac Island, when what is now the summer resort was known as "The Queen of the West." When she was 4 years old, her father, a carpenter and ship builder, moved his family to Beaver Island, then an important port of call for the wood burning vessels of the day. A year before, James J. Strang, a dissenter from the Mormon church as later organized in Utah, had established his "kingdom" on the island.

When she was eight years old the self styled "king" whose depredations had brought him into the United States court at Detroit, but who always had escaped conviction, called the Gentiles of the island together and gave them the choice between being baptized or leaving. The father of Mrs. Williams chose to leave.

Four years later King Strang was arrested by United States officials and was being taken to the boat for transfer to Mackinac Island when he was shot from behind while in the custody of the officers. The story is that the bullet was fired by a man who had been whipped at the public whipping post because his wife had refused to wear the bloomers that the Mormon monarch decreed.

The death of the Mormon leader broke up the Mormon colony, and a year later Mrs. Williams went back to the island. She remained there for 27 years. Her first husband was Clement Van Riper, who had gone to Beaver Island from Detroit for his health and who was appointed keeper of the light when Peter McKinley, cousin of the martyred president, resigned in 1869.

One stormy day in 1872 Van Riper in a small boat, went to the aid of a stricken vessel, was swept overboard and never came up. His widow was appointed keeper of the light—the first appointment of a woman as light house keeper in the United States. In 1875 Mrs. Williams was married to her present husband, Daniel Williams.

MICHIGAN COWS SHOW BIG GAIN IN BUTTER FAT

Development of the dairy industry in Michigan is indicated by the report of the year 1928, just prepared by Prof. O. E. Reed, head of the college dairy husbandry department, showing an increase in cow testing associations from 11 in 1922 to 104 during the last year, and an increase in the average production of butter fat per cow from 274.8 to 301.9.

Professor Reed, in his report, points out that with an increase of 30 pounds of butter fat per year per cow, the average herd of 11 cows will show a total increase of 330 pounds, which at 42 cents a pound means $132 a year for each herd. The extra feed required is less than $30 for the herd.

Among other lines of endeavor followed during the last year, was the weeding out of unprofitable cows from the dairy herds. In 1926, 9.42 per cent of the cows enrolled in cow testing associations records were sold to butchers because their lack of productive ability did not warrant keeping them. The number given by Professor Reed is 2,696 cows, or 128 carloads sold.

Better feeds and feeding were stressed by the cow test groups, dairy meetings and special schools held in 10 counties.

BLIND GIRL PREPARING TO ENTER MUSIC COLLEGE

Spurred on by hopes of a career as concert singer and pianist, Miss Nancy MacCrindle is studying music as her major subject at Michigan State college, preparatory to entering the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music. All of which would not be particularly noteworthy except for the fact that Miss MacCrindle is blind.

Formerly a student at the Lansing School for the Blind, Miss MacCrindle was encouraged by the superintendent to enter M. S. C. and to further her education. Along with five others from the school, she enrolled as a freshman at State college in the fall of 1925. The first year she was occupied with the task of becoming acclimated to the campus and to college life., but this year she has found time to devote herself more fully to the study of music.

NEW YORK CROP PRICE

Michigan beat New York state when it came to market prices for the grape crop of 1926. Michigan grapes from the fruit belt averaged $3 a ton more than did the New York crop. The Michigan district was visited last season by an investigation committee of several New York marketing agencies who came to learn Michigan methods of grape culture.

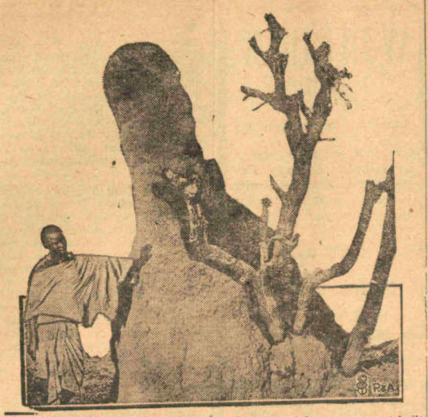
A "Skyscraper" of "Ant-Land"



That mound-like structure you see pictured above is a "skyscraper in ant-land"—plainly, an enormous ant hill recently discovered in Abyssinia. Scientific terminologists, however, tell us this unusual fortress was not built by the type of ants we're accustomed to seeing—but by a species known as "Termites." Radio Topics

This radio section is conducted by the staff of the Federated Radio Trade School, 4464 Cass Avenue, Detroit, Mich. Any questions or problems should be sent to the Editor of this newspaper, where they will be referred to th school technicans and promptly answered without charge.

The use of radio sets on railroad trains is little more than a novelty, yet many surprising reception records have been made. Passengers in the observation car o afCanadian National transcontiental express recently listened to the strains of music broadcast by Vera Cruz, Mexico, while their train was thundering along at sixty miles per hour near Edmonton, Alberta. Prior to this, while passing through Manitoba, they were regaled with dance music direct from Mexico City.

Three years ago The Canadian National, seeking to relieve the monotonly of long train journeys decided to equip all its de luxe trains with radio. The choice of a standard neutrodyne receiver was made and the installation begun. All of the sets are permanently fitted into the observation cars, and a pair of ear phones placed on each chair so that the broadcasting could be plainly heard above the roar of the train.

The installations have been completely successful during the three years of operation and so far as the reception of distant stations is concerned, they have exceeded expectations. This has proven very entertaining to the passengers because in addition to receiving the latest news and financial reports from Canadian and American stations, they have been able to enjoy the music of other countries. Experience has shown that even when the weather varies rapidly from falling snow to torrid heat.

Radio Noises On Phonograph Records

The earlier days of broadcasting used to be bad enough when we had to listen to the phonograph over the radio. Now, a Chicago man proposes to listen to radio over the phonograph. His scheme is to record on a phonograph record all of the possible noises that may come from a radio set. The record must also tell the name of each noise and its cause.

Thus, when a receiver goes bad and sounds like a skeleton doing the Charleston on a tin roof—the listener needs only to put his radio-trouble record on the phonnograph. He then listens closely and picks out the noise which sounds most like the one coming from his radio. The phonograph record will then tell what causes that kind of a noise and the listener can proceed to cure his trouble.

Time Signals Require Elaborate System

The reception o ftime signals from the government radio station at Arlington for re-broadcast on KDKA's 309 meter wave entails an elaborate trapping and receiving system. The receiving set is located about a hundred feet from the transmitting station which has two sets of antennas —for long and short waves.

In order to bring in station NAA on the receiver which is so close to KDKA's transmitter, a trap for each wave band is installed before the receiving set. Outside wires are sheathed in lead cable, and the apparatus shielded by metallic screens. A metal covered cable carries the signals to KDKA's transmitter.

$14,625,000 IS LIVE STOCK VALUE

The total value of the five principal classes of live stock on Michigan farms on January 1 is estimated to have been $146,652,000. Cattle and hog prices are higher than one year ago; horses and mules are reported to be the same, and sheep are lower. There were increases in the number of sheep and swine and decreases in horses and cattle. One year ago, the total value was $139,732,000 or a net gain for 1926 of approximately $7,000,000, according to the annual live stock report issued by Verne H. Church, U. S. agricultural statistician for Michigan, and L. Whitney Watkins, commissioner of agriculture. The gain during 1925 was about the same as during the last year.

The increasing use of power driven machinery on the farm has steadily displaced a portion of the horse population each year during the last decade. It is now estimated that only 444,000 horses and colts were owned by Michigan farmers on January 1, compared with 463,000 one year ago, 482,000 two years ago and 606,000 in 1920. The value averages $89 a head which is the same as last year and $15 more than two years ago. The total value is $39,516,000.

The number of mules in Michigan is small in comparison with horses, the total being 8,000. The total value is $688,000 or $86 a head. The number does not change materially from year to year and the price per head is the same as one year ago.

The progress made in tuberculosis eradication and cow testing has eliminated many diseased and other unprofitable cows. It has also created a strong demand for Michigan cows and $15,000 were shipped out of the state during the past year for dairy purposes. This and other factors have reduced the number on hand by 17,000 as compared with last year. The total number as estimated for January 1 was 841,000 with a value of $61,912,000 as compared with $54,912,000 one year ago.

The average value per head increased during the year from $64 to $73. There are 153,000 heifers from one to two years of age being kept for dairy purposes, compared with 149,000 one year ago.

It is nof estimated that there are 1,314,000 sheep in the state with an average value of $10.44 a head. On January 1, 1926, the number was estimated at 1,173,000 with an average value of $11.98 each. Owing to lower prices this year, the larger number has a less total value than those of one year ago, it being $13,718,000 against $14,864,000. The sheep industry has been on the increase since 1922 in Michigan.

The net increase in the number of hogs and pigs in Michigan during 1926 was 22,000, or a total of 749,000 on January 1 of this year. These had a total value of $13,108,000 or an average of $17.50 a head. One year ago the average value per head was $16.20.

LAPEER MATRON OLDEST STATE INSTITUTION WORKER

The distinction of being the oldest institution employe in point of service in the state belongs to Miss Mary McIlveen, housekeeper and general matron of the Michigan Home and Training school at Lapeer.

Miss McIlveen has eaten 32 Christmas dinners at the home and you simply could not hire her to miss the holidays at the institution.

Thirty-two years of service to unfortunate children is a wonderful record, but the institution was founded in 1895 and Miss McIlveen came from her home in Clarkston as an attendant shortly after.

It is only a matter of time until a fast young man discovers that the race isn't always to the swift.

Reforms are far easier to bear than reformers.

CLOSED SEASON SEEN AS BIG BENEFIT TO QUAIL IN NORTHLAND

Indications that partridge in the Upper Peninsula profited by the 1926 closed season in that district are found in daily reports received by the Department of Conservation from its game wardens.

Decrease in partridge throughout the state, particularly in the upper peninsula, caused the conservation commission last year to order a closed season in the district north of the straits. It was hoped the action would give the birds a chance to stage a come back.

The action accomplished its purpose in a measure, it is believed, as game wardens in the field are making daily reports of flocks. The birds seem to be healthy and are finding plenty of food, the wardens say.

Deer also are in good condition, and are weathering well, according to Edward J. Ducas, warden at Gwinn, Marquette county. He reports finding yards where from 15 to 100 deer are wintering.

Ducas says beaver dams are plentiful in his district, with the houses running from five to 10 animals.

LOG CABIN ERECTED AS BAY CITY OFFICE BUILDING

Something new in office buildings was erected at Bay City. While other cities are trying to see what dizzy heights skyscrapers may be pushed, Bay City points with pride to a one-story office building, located in the heart of the business district.

It is a log cabin, yet far from primitive in its accommodations. No husky lad is needed to carry in great logs be fed the huge fireplace, for in place of logs is a large gas heater. Blazing pine knots or candles have been replaced by electric lights.

Typifying the pioneer period and reminiscent in architectural design of Michigan's recreational resources, the cabin office building now fittingly houses the office of the East Michigan Tourist association and the Northeastern Michian Development bureau.

The cabin was constructed almost entirely of materials available in Michigan. Michigan mined coal helps to make the gas which heats the cabin; electricity for lighting comes from a high voltage net work supplied by by Michigan water powers and steam plants. Stones for the fire place were sent from each of the counties affiliated with the two organizations.

MAINE GRANTS EDSEL RIGHT TO BUILD BRIDGE

The Maine legislature, under suspension of the rules, passed an act giving Edsel Ford, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and other summer residents the right to construct a bridge on Mt. Desert island.

The measure was signed at once by Governor Brewster.

The bridge will cost $500,000 and be 600 feet in length, of concrete and stone construction. It will run from the Otter Creek naval radio station road to the Seal Harbor road.

3 LIVE AFTER LIGHTNING HITS HOME, MELTS BED

Mr. and Mrs. Leon Rector and their three-year-old son Robert, are recovering from shock and burns suffered when a lightning bolt entered their bed room of their home in Battle Creek.

All three were burned by falling electrical fixtures and wires that had been made red hot by the bolt which entered the room through the ceiling and struck an iron bed in which the mother and father were sleeping, and melting part of the bedstead.

MISS HAMILTON QUITS ANN ARBOR FACULTY

The resignation of Miss Jean Hamilton as dean of women of the University of Michigan was announced from the president's office. Miss Hamilton was granted a leave of absence for the academic years of 1926-27 by the board of regents last June. Her resignation will take effect at the end of the school year.

GULLES FARE ILL ON FROZEN LAKE

The herring gull is perpetually hungry. No matter how much food a gull discovers in its peregrinations, it is always ready for more. There is something ravenous in the aspect of the big, storm beaten Lake Michigan gulls as they comb the waters for something to eat, particularly in the winter—a bad season for the scavengers. In the summer when dead fish are cast upon the shore by countless hundreds and tons of garbage and refuse are dumped by steamers, the gull lives a life of pampered ease. There is always plenty to eat. But in the winter, when the lakes are choked with ice and the shores are locked by immense floes, it is very hard to gain a livelihood. The gull must fight desperately against starvation.

Occasionally in the winter, however, commercial fishermen furnish a welcome feast. On such events the gaunt gray gulls have an opportunity to demonstrate their prowess at gluttony. They consume unbelievable amounts of food with hoarse screams of triumph that attract and bring to the scene every member of the fraternity within hearing. They eat and eat until they are so distended they find it hard to fly, and then they rest on the water until their rapid digestions come to their relief, enabling them to return for more.

With cold, bleak days ahead that promise nothing certain in the way of dinners, the gulls may well stuff them selves, for weeks may pass before they have another chance.

Several commercial fishermen at St. Joseph recently gave the gulls a feast they will undoubtedly remember for a long time. The fishermen came in with a big load of lake trout and lawyers and tied up in the St. Joseph River, where they proceeded to strip their nets. Hundreds of four-five and six inch herrings formed a part of the catch, and these were thrown into the water by the fishermen as soon as they were disentangled. They had, of course, no market value.

After a half dozen of the little herrings had floated down stream the gulls soon discovered their good fortune. They came from everywhere and with astonishing rapidity. They wheeled and circled, fluttered and dipped at the stern of the tug as the men tossed out the shimmering fish, snatching them up as they floated within reach and swallowing them with two or three gulps. When the herrings had sunk a few inches below the water the hungry birds would alight beside them and seize the morsels by thrusting their heads far under water.

TOURIST CAMPING SITE GIVEN CITY OF STANDISH

At a meeting of the board of commerce, Mayor H. A. Chamberlain presented to the city of Standish a plat of ground in the west part of the city which has been used for a tourist camping ground. This is an ideal place for a camping ground, being situated in a grove with a good well near at hand.

Michigan Needs More Tuberculosis Sanatorium

Apropos of the recent idea of plumbing the new prison comes the demand for more hospital service in the state for tuberculosis patients. It seems as if the fact that many precious lives are hanging in the balance because they can not get expert treatment for consumption ought to appeal to Governor Green in stentorian tones That $75,000 which goes to buy bath tubs for the prison would make a mighty up-lift for sanatorium needs in the commonwealth. Seems as if these over at Jackson could wait, but the tuberculosis patients cannot. For some reason Michigan's death rate from this disease keeps well up to top and with proper preventative measures it is a cinch the number could be kept down.

It is a matter of common knowledge, according to T. J. Werle, executive secretary of the Michigan Tuberculosis Association, that people die while waiting to be admitted to Michigan's unfortunate state tuberculosis sanatorium. Everyone in the state who has had any association with tuberculosis can cite instance after instance of patients who have applied for admission and then waited weeks, months, before they were at last admitted. Everyone who has known anything about the situation has known that frequently these sick ones died before ever the call came. Some who did not die had progressed so far they could no longer be admitted at Howell, for Howell has preferred only the ambulant case, Others went, but because the wait had been so long their going was too late; they remained a while and then were sent home to die. Others more fortunate, were taken in time so that through treatment they did improve, but because they had to wait so long, their stay also was longer, and while they were spending that necessary longer time in Howell, some other person for whom there was no bed, was spending an equally longer time waiting.

The waiting list spells stark tragedy, according to Mr. Werle. He cites the case of a young girl of 18, one of many such cases. When found, she was an active case, but a case with a chance for recovery. Six months she waited before the call came for her to go to the sanatorium, six months, while she grew steadily worse.

Then the call came. Too late. She went, and as she had waited six months she stayed six months. Then she came home, to die. There for months more, the house turned into a house of hush and sorrow, she waited until death came. She is but one case typical of many.

David Sarnoff

Canton, N. Y.—David Sarnoff, Vice-President and General Manager of the Radio Corporation of America, in an address on "Uncharted Roads of Radio Development" delivered before The St. Lawrence University recently, declared that the air will be the future laboratory of radio development, and that the greater service which radio envisages is in the [illegible] of the electrical scientists now being trained in American universities.

"It is true that the building of a transmitting or broadcasting station and the construction of a radio receiving set have become matters of practical engineering and precise manufacture," Mr. Sarnoff declared. "We also know that electrical energy generated at a given frequency can be radiated in the form of electrical waves which travel in every direction. We know too some of the laws that govern the effective detection and utilization of such electrical signals and we have developed methods of amplifying these signals till they reach an audibility satisfactory to the human ear.

HE GOT THE GANG

We are not much surprised but considerably elatcd over the success of our County Sheriff who is to be candid, the first real he-man we have had in office in the sheriff's department for several years. In another column of this issue will be found a mention of raiding three "hooch" factories in the near-by town of Jonesville. and judging from the array of prisoners and quantity of liquor taken, most of Hillsdale county has been supplied from this source. Kerr made a technical change, Heretofore it has been customary for sheriffs to begin making loud noises three days in advance of a raid, so that all the "hooch pimps" in Southern Michigan would know about it, and hie themselves to more congenial climes, leaving only a small amount of paraphernalia and only enough liquor to smell. Well. we wonder what the Jonesville scribe thinks about the raid anyhow! Does he presume Sheriff Kerr "smelled" them out or how did he arrive at the conclusion? Kerr rounded up eleven birds both male and female, this time and there are others to follow. He jailed them for classification, and as the population of Jonesville is considerably depleted thereby it will be necessary to return these before he gets any others It is reported a powerful "smelling" apparatus has been installed in jail which is sensitive way out to Fort Wayne.

Russell Wattles has been quite sick with the grippe.

CHAPTER FIFTY-SIX

Brazenose coughed, apparently having a bit of trouble with his throat, and his son arose to swing away to a window, where he stood looking off over roofs to a dark horizon.

"Is that all I'm to know about it?"

"No. I'll tell you. She said I'd never given you a chance to show what was in you—and she is right. She said I couldn't expect anybody with your imagination and wealth of resource and—and all that—to keep it bottled up while you attended to a lot of little petty details that any forty-dollar clerk could handle. She said I was throwing away in a fit of temper the most valuable asset I had, for myself or the business. The capitals had been erased from the high priest's reference to his altar. It was the Brazenose way to do thoroughly anything once undertaen.

"She said I was considering property at the expense of life—and she was dafn well right. I was. But I hadn't sense enough to see it until she rubbed it in. She said life ought to be proportioned — rounded — and that I'd deformed my own and was trying to train your back into the same hump."

"That sounds—pretty hard."

"Oh, she said other things, too, about—about you and me. You must have talked more than you usually do, Boy—about us. And she seemed to know what your mother wanted you to be."

There was a long pause, each man too moved to trust his voice. At last, still facing the window, Piggy said huskily:

"She's a wonder!"

"She's all that. I don't know how R. K. Scott ever came to have such a daughter. She may be a whippet to look at, but she's big inside. I hoped you were going to marry her, but she says she's going to marry some body else in a day or two. Who ie hs?"

"Nixon."

"H'mph! You're going to stand for it?"

"Sure."

"Then I'm not the only fool in the family, son."

Silence.

"Why don't you cut him out?"

"She's been—engaged to him for a long time, I guess. Anyway, she came over to marry him. What could I do about it—even—even if I'd wanted to?" said Piggy, in a tone speaking volumes to his suddenly observant sire.

Another long pause. Then Brazenose asked gently, "Had your dinner, boy?"

"No."

"Neither have we. We waited for you, and it's getting late. Change your clothes and we'll go down to the girls."

"I—I'd rather not, dad. Can't we have dinner alone—just you and me?"

"Afraid not, this time. Roberta wants to see you."

Piggy shut his teeth hard, squared his shoulders and turned toward his father again.

"All right. I'll change now. Mind if I take time for a bath?"

One glance showed Brazenose that in those days at Fitzwillian his son had added cubits to his stature. There was a new, stern firmness about the mouth and chin, a new, deep clarity in the steady gray eyes. He put out a hand and gripped the other's arm.

"I just want to say this now, P. G., we've both been fools—but I guess that's largely my fault. I've always treated you like a gid. That's over. I'm learning to know a man when I see one—and I'm proud of you, boy."

Only when he was in his bath did it occur to Piggy that he had not yet learned how or why the detectives had been removed from his path, nor what had been done about Scott. He ought to ask, too, how the business situation stood now, and whether his father had made any progress toward a satisfactory arrangement with Killigrew. That meant an awful lot to dad. As soon as he could he opened the door and shouted:

"Dad, what about that Killigrew automatic threader?'

Receiving no reply, he looked out and found the room empty. A sheet of notepaper stood popped against the Gideon bible on the table, with a scrawl in his father's hand stating that he had gone down to order dinner, which would be served in the girls' sitting room, where Piggy was to present himself as early as possible. He wondered briefly why dad had bothered to write instead of singing out, unaware that during his own seclusion instructions had come up from Headquarters; but his mind was too fully occupied with large things to concern itself with trifles. When he had finished dressing he went downstairs and rapped at the indicated door.

Roberta opened it, and a glance over her head showed him that she was alone. He backed precipitately away, stammering:

Oh, Oh, I thought dad was here. I'll go and find him."

"Come in, Peter—please." she begged, with an unwonted and adorable shyness. "I asked him not to come for a little while. I—I want to see yo ualone—just a minute."

Piggy went in, much as he would have walked over hot plowshares if she had requested it in that tone. She softly closed the door.

"I just want to thank you, now that it's all over." Standing before him, hands clasped and eyes glowing in a colorless face, she spoke in a small fluttering voice that tore at his heartstrings. "You've been wonderful."

"I didn't do anything," he said, abashed and unhappy.

"You did everything. If it hadn't been for you, Celia would be at Birchwood yet. It was all you—your ideas, your money, your imagination and courage and—and loyalty."

"I merely got us into a hole." His tone was not as gruff as he had hoped to make it. "You got us out. I don't know how."

"Oh, didn't he tell you? It was your dad. He's perfectly wonderful, Peter. He's like you in foreseeing everything and preparing for it. He knows father, too, and how to handle him. He took me to a lawyer afterward, just to make sure, but he planned every bit of it himself. He told me exactly what to say and do, and what to expect. I went to Birchwood, you know, and bullied father into dropping the whole thing.' At that tense moment, the absurdity of a whippet bullying the mighty G. A., true though the statement was, occurred to neither of them. "And when I'd done it, I telephoned from Winchenden to Mr. Brazenose—he was waiting in Boston—and he sent the telegram we'd fixed up in the morning. So you see it was all you—you and he together."

"Well, you—you got dad back for me—so we're even," he returned, furious because his voice was unmanageable. "That was bully of you."

"But I owed you that." she cried.

"I couldn't let such an awful thing happen to you on my ac— not after all you'd done for me—for us, I mean." Floundering in unpremediated personalities, she made hasty amendment. "Of course, I know it wasn't for us—I mean not because you— I understand perfectly that you don't like girls. You just pitched in and helped us because it was a fine thing to do, and—and because you are like that."

"Oh, that was—it was just because it looked lige a good sporting proposition—at first," he explained awkwardly, wishing with all his soul that dad would come and put an end to this torture.

CHAPTER FIFTY-SEVEN

Roberta was talking quietly. "That's what I mean. There wasn't anything personal in it. You just saw something big to do and did it. I've konwn that all along, and—I'm sorry that I teased you, Peter. I wouldn't, if I'd known. I didn't mean to hurt you."

"Hurt me?" he had forgotten her part in their late encounter.

"About—your name, you know."

"Oh!" Color flooded his face, which had been as pale as hers. "Oh, I'd forgotten that; that's all right. My fault entirely. Forget it."

"I will. I'll always think of you as Peter."

This was a little more than Piggy could bear, and to escape one agony, he inflicted worse upon himself, in his need of defense against self betrayal.

"Is—Nixon here?"

"Clif! Oh, no! He's never to know anything about you. Nobody is. But I met him today, accidentally, and he's coming down to New York to see me tomorrow night."

"Oh!" said Piggy, politely. "You'll be married right away, I suppose?"

"That's another thing." She spoke hurriedly, embarrassment written in every lineament. "I owe you a lot of money, and this morning your father made me take more. I meant to ask Clif to pay it all—afterward. But I'm afraid you will have to wait now. Until—until I can earn it. I'm not going to be married."

"What?"

She hung her head. "No, I—I can't. I thought I could. I tried, but—I'm sorry; you'll have to wait."

He made no answer, but he took a step toward her, audibly catching his breath, and she looked up at him. In the next instant she was swept into his arms, his lips upon hers.

"Oh, Bob! I thought I'd lost you," he whispered, between kisses.

"Why—why, Peter!" she gasped, when he would allow her. "Do you care, too?"

"Care! I've cared from the first minute. What do you think I chased off with you for? Think I make a habit of running away with girls? Cars! Why, Bob, I've been the most miserable devil——'

That was as far as he could go without further solace from her assuaging lips and repeated assurances that despite his manifest unworthiness she loved him.

"Not going to be married, aren't you?" he chuckled during the next comparatively sane interlude. "You'll be Mrs. Percival Galahad Brazenose tomorrow. How'll you like that on your visiting cards?"

She protested that the morrow would be too soon, mentioned that she had many things to do, and asked with apparent irrelevanse whether he thot they'd ever find her trunks.

"Trunks? What have your trunks
"My clothes, Peter!"
to do with it?"

"Rats!" Piggy was himself again. "Think I'm going to marry you in anything except that brown rig you have on? Suits me, all right. I'm not going to let you go again—not farther than the end of my arm. You would run away from me, would you? Well, I'll show you! The first thing we do in New York tomorrow will be to find a parson and tie you tight!"

"But Clif thinks we're still engaged. He's coming to see me tomorrow night."

"He'll find the fair Ellen is Lochinvar's bride. Write him a note to that effect—or send some girl you never saw before to tell him! Poor old Whangdoodle!' Piggy felt an honest pang of sympathy for the unfortunate Nixon, though in his heart of hearts he believed that Whangdoodle were born, not made, and no more to be transmogrified than the leopard or the Ethiope. "He's had his chance and lost it."

A dismreet tap at the door drove them apart.

"Come in," said Roberta, and than, auraciously: ?Oh, it's dad."

"Wha-at?" The elder Brazenose looked from one to the other.

"Sure!" Piggy grinned and gathered her in again by an arm flung around her shoulders. "Who says I'm not an obedient boy? You told me to marry her, and I'm going to—tomorrow."

"You'll do," said his father. Then he kissed his new daughter.

At this point dinner was served. Celia limped in from an adjoining room to be astounded by the latest development, and they sent for Janet, whose burden of remorse ceased to be. Some time later they calmed down sufficiently to supply, between them, a detailed account of the day's proceedings.

"I found out one thing that I'll never forget," Roberta said mischievously. "Dad may growl some times, Peter, but inside he's just like us. You ought to have seen his eyes this morning when he was planning my raid on Birchwood."

"Oh, sure,' Brazenose agreed, with a grin only less boyish than his son's. "We're three bears when we get started. Big bear, little bear—I'm the in-between bear."

"And the one who's sure to get squeezed." The little bear's face clouded. "We can't be married very soon, Peter, because if we are father's sure to spot you instantly, and he'll take it out on dad—who has trouble enough with him now."

"Don't let that stand in your way, my dear." The elder man kissed her hand, bringing a brighter color to her face. "We're considering life now, not property."

She shook her head, twinkling back at him. "Not to that extent. There is such a thing as proportion, you know—balance. And you've done so much for Peter andme, you must let us do our share. Besides, it may take me some time to make arrangements for Celia. We'll wait six months—"

"Six months!" Piggy roared.

"Janet and I will look out for Celia. You'll be married tomorrow—quietly. It needn't be generally known. I'll see to that. Then you'll take this young man away and sequester him somewhere out of sight until his hair grows. He can't come into my offices yearing that mane. Perhaps by the time you get back and the marriage is announced, I" have found another threader and can tell Scott to go to hell—begging your pardon, girls."

"By the way, how did you come out with Killigrew? Piggy asked.

"Didn't see him. oGt caught in a cyclone." His father smiled at Roberta, who inquired:

"Who's Killigrew?"

They told her about the hen minded inventor, clucking over his unfledged chick, and when she had grasped the situation, she said:

"Why, that's simple! We'll be married tomorrow, Peter, and go straight to Boston. You can make that man sell his thing to dad."

Brazenose snorted, quite in his normal manner. "He make him! Killigrew's a man-size job, young lady. I worked with him for months myself and never made a dent in him. P. G. could no more——"

"Oh, la, la!" said Roberta, with a roguish glance.

Checked, he took thought for an instant and then leaned toward her argumentatively, laughter in his eyes.

"I'll bet you a thousand dollars to a nickel that P. G. can't buy that machine."

"Done!" she cried. "He'll do it."

He did.

THE END

A PIECE OF BREAD

By FRANCOIS COPPEE

The young Duc de Hardimont happened to be at Aix in Savoy, whose waters he hoped would benefit his famous mare, Perichole, who had become wind broken since the cold she had caught at the last Derby—and was finishing his breakfast while glancing over the morning paper, when he read the news of the disastrous engagement at Reichshoffen.

He emptied his glass of chartreuse, laid his napkin upon the restaurant table, ordered his valet to pack his trunks, and two hours later took the express to Paris, arriving there, he hastened to the recruiting office and enlisted in a regiment of the line.

In vain had he led the enervating life of a fashionable swell—that was the word of the time—and had knicked about race course stables from the age of nineteen to twenty-five. In circumstances like these, he could not forget that Enguerrand de Hardimont died of the plague at Tunis the same day as Saint Louis, that Jean de Hardimont commanded the Free Companies under Du Gueslin, and that Francois-Henri de Hardimont was killed at Fontenoy with "Red" Maison. Upon learning that France had lost a battle on French soil, the young duke felt the blood mount to his face, giving him a horrible feeling of suffocation.

And so, early in November, 1870, Henri de Hardimont returned to Paris with his regiment, forming part of Vinoy's corps, and his company being the advance guard before the redoubt of Hautes Bruyeres, a position fortified in haste, and which protected the cannon of Fort Bicetre.

It was a gloomy place! a raod planted with clusters of broom, and broken up i nto muddy ruts, traversing the leprous fields of the neighborhood; on the border stood an abandoned tavern, a tavern with arbors, where the soldiers had established their post. They had fallen back here a few days before; the grape shot had broken down home of the young trees and all of them bore upon their bark the white scars of bullet wounds. As for the house, its appearance made one shudder; the roof had been torn by a shell, and the walls seemed whitewashed with blood. The torn and shattered arbors under their network of twigs, the rolling of an unset cask, the high swing whose wet rope groaned in the damp wind, and the inscriptions over the door, murrowed by bullets; "Cabinets de societe—Absinthe—Vermonth Vin a 60 cent le litre"—encircling a dead rabbit painted over two billiard cues tied in a cross by a ribbon—all this recalled with cruel irony the popular entertainment of former days. And over all, a wretched winter sky, across which rolled heavy leaden clouds, an odious sky, angry and hateful.

At the door of the tavern stood the young duke, motionless, with his gun in his shoulder belt, his cap over his yes, his benumbed hands in the pockets of his red trousers, and shivering in his sheep skin coat. He gave himself up to his sombre thoughts, this defeated soldier, and looked with sorrowful eyes toward a line of hills, lost in the fog, where could be seen each moment, the flash and smoke of a Krupp gun, followed by a report.

Suddenly he felt hungry.

Stooping, he drew from his knapsack, which stood near him leaning against the wall, a piece of ammunition bread, and as he had lost his knife he bit off a morsel and slowly ate it.

But after a few mouthfuls, he had enough of it; the bread was hard and had a bitter taste. No fresh would be given until the next morning's distribution, so the commissary officer had willed it. This was certainly a very hard life sometimes. The remembrance of former breakfasts came to him, such as he had called "hygienic," when, the day after too overheating a supper, he would seat himself by a window on the ground floor of the Cafe Anglais, and be served with a cutlet, or buttered eggs with asparagus tips, and the butler, knowing his tastes, would bring him a fine bottle of old Leoville, lying in its basket, and which he would pour out with the greatest care. The deuce take it! That was a good time, all the same, and he would never become accustomed to this life of wretchedness.

And, in a moment of impatience, the young man threw the rest of his bread into the mud.

At the same moment a soldier of the line came from the tavern, stooped and picked up the bread, drew back a few steps, wiped it with his sleeve and began to devour it eagerly.

Henri de Hardimont was already ashamed of his action, and now with a feeling of pity, watched the poor devil who gave proof of such a good appetite. He was a tall, large young fellow, but badly made; with feverish eyes and a hospital beard, and so thin that his shoulder-blades stood out beneath his well worn cape.

"You are very hungry?" he said, approaching the soldier.

"As you see," replied the other with his mouth full.

"Excuse me then. For if I had known that you would like the bread, I would not have thrown it away."

"It does not harm it," replied the soldier, "I am not dainty."

"No matter," said the gentleman, "it was wrong to do so, and I reproach myself. But I do not wish you to have a bad opinion of me, and as I have some old cognac in my can, let us drink a drop together."

The man had finished eating. The duke and he drank a mouthful of the brandy; the acquaintance was made.

'What is your name?" asked the soldier of the line.

"Hardimont," replied the duke, omitting his title. "And yours?"

"Jean Victor—I have just entered this company—I am just out of the ambulance—I was wounded at Chatillon—oh! but it was good in the ambulance, and in the informary they gave me horse buillon. But I had only a scratch, and the major signed my dismissal. So much the worse for me! Now I am going to commence to be devoured by hunger again—for, believe me, if you will, comrade, but, such as you see me, I have been hungry all my life."

The words were startling, especially to a Sybarite who had just been longing for the kitchen of the Cafe Anglais, and the Duc de Hardimont looked at his companion in almost territied amazement. The soldier smiled sadly, showing his hungry, wolf like teeth, as white as his sickly face, and as if understanding that the other expected something further in the way of explanation or confidence:

"Come," said he, suddenly ceasing his familiar way of speaking, doubtless divining that his companion belonged to the rich and happy; "let us walk along the road to warm our feet, and I will tell you things, which probably you have never heard of—I am called Jean Victor, that is all, for I am a foundling, and my only happy remembrance is of my earlier childhood at the asylum. The sheets were white on our little beds in the dormitory; we played in a garden under large trees, and a kind Sister took care of us, quite young and as pale as a wax taper—she died afterwards of lung trouble—I was her favorite and would rather walk by her than play with the other children, because she used to draw me to her side and lay her warm thin hand on my forehead. But when I was twelve years old, after my first communion, there was nothing but poverty. The managers put me as apprentice with a chair mender in Faubourg Saint-Jacques. That is not a trade, you know, it is impossible to earn one's living at it, and as proof of it, the greater part of the time the master was only able to engage the poor little blind boys from the blind asylum. It was there that I began to suffer with hunger. The master and mistress, two old Limousins—afterwards murdered, were terrible misers, and the bread, cut in tiny pieces for each meal, was kept under lock and key the rest of the time. You should have seen the mistress at supper time serving the soup, sighing at each ladelful she dished out. The other apprentices, two blind boys, were less unhappy; they were not given more than I, but they could not see the reproachful look the wicked woman used to give me as she handed me my plate. And then, unfortunately, I was always so terribly hungry. Was it my fault, do you think? I served there for three years, in a continual fit of hunger. Three years! And one can learn the work in one month. But the managers could ot know everything, and had no suspicio that the children were abused. Ah, you were astonished just now when you saw me take the bread out of the mud?

I am used to that for I have picked up enough of it; and crusts from the dust, and when they were too hard and dry, I would soak them all night in my basin. I had windfalls sometimes, such as pieces of bread nibbled at the ends, which the children would take out of their baskets and throw on the sidewalks as they came from school. I used to try to prowl around there when I went on errands. At last my time was ended at this trade by which no man can support himself. Well, I did many other things, for I was willing eonugh to work. I served the masons; I have been shop boy, floor polisher, I don't know what all! But, pshaw; today, work is lacking, another time I lose my place. Briefly, I never have had enough to eat Heavtns! how often have I been crazy with hunger as I have passed the bakeries! Fortunately for me, at these times I have always remembered the good Sister at the asylum, who so often told me to be honest, and I seemed to feel her warm little hand upon my forehead. At last, when I was eighteen I enlisted; you know as well as I do, that the trooper has only just enough. Now,—I could almost laugh—here is the seige and famine! You see, I did not lie, when I told you just now that I have always, always been hungry.

The young duke had a kind heart and was profoundly moved by this terrible stor, told him by a man like him self, by a soldier whose uniform made him his equal. It was even fortunate for the phlegm of this dandy, that the night wind dried the tears which had dimmed his eyes.

"Jean Victor," said her, ceasing in his turn, by a delicate tact, to speak familiarly to the foundling, "if we survive this dreadful war, we will meet again, and I hope that I may be useful to you. But, in the meantime, as there is no bakery but the commissary, and as my ration of bread is twice too large for my delicate appetiteJit is understood, is it not?—we will share it loke good comrades."

It was strong and hearty, the hand clasp which followed; then, harassed and worn by their frequent watches and alarms, as night fell, they returned to the tavern, where twelve soldiers were sleeping on the straw, and throwing themselves down side by side, they were soon sleeping soundly.

Toward midnight, Jean Victor awoke, being hungry, probably. The wind had scattered the clouds, and a ray of moonlight made its way into the room through a hole in the roof, lighting up the handsome blonde head of the young duke, who was sleeping like an Endymion.

Still touched by the kindness of his comrade, Jean Victor was gazing at him with admiration, when the sergeant of the platoon opened the door and called the five men who were to relieve the sentinels of the out posts. The duke was of the number, but he did not awken when his name was called.

"Hardimont, stand up!" repeated the non-commissioned officer.

"If you are willing, sergeant," said Jean Victor rising, "I will take his duty, he is sleeping so soundly—and he is my comrade."

"As you please."

The five men left, and the snoring recommenced.

But half an hour later the noise of near and rapid firing burst upon the night. On an instant every man was on his feet, and each with his hand on the chamber of his gun, stepped cautiously out, looking earnestly along the road, lying white in the moonlight.

"What time is it?" asked the duke. "I was to go on duty tonight."

"Jean Victor went in your place."

At that moment a soldier was seen runnig toward them anlong the road.

"What is it?" they cried as he stopped, out of breath.

"The Prussians have attacked us, let us fall back to the redoubt."

"And your comrades?"

"They are coming—all but poor Jean Victor."

"Where is he?" cried the duke.

"Shot through the head with a bullet—died without a word—ough!"

* * *

One night last winter, the Duc de Hardimont left his club about two o'clock in the morning, with his neighbor, Count de Saulnes; the duke had lost some hundred louis, and had a slight headache.

'If you are willing, Andre," he said to his companion, "we will go home on foot—I need the air."

"Just as you please, I am willing, although the walking may be bad."

They dismissed their coupes, turned up the collars of their overcoats, and set off toward the Madeleine. Suddenly an object rolled before the duke which he had struck with the toe of his boot; it was a large piece of bread spattered with mud.

Then to his amazement, Monsieur de Saulnes saw the Duc de Hardimont pick up the piece of bread, wipe it carefully with his handkerchief embroidered with his armorial bearings, and place it on a bench, in full view under the gaslight.

"What did you do that for?" asked the count, laughing heartily, "are you crazy?"

"It is in memory of a poor fellow who died for me," replied the duke in a voice which trembled slightly, "do not laugh, my friend, it offends me."

AGED BARNS TO GO AT STATE COLLEGE

Barns and other farm buildings that have stood on the campus at Michigan State college ever since it was founded 70 years ago will be torn down and replaced with a plant modern in every respect, if the state legislature grants funds requested in the college budget.

The total amount made avaliable for barns since 1890 has been oly $17,500, according to Dr. R. S. Shaw, dean of agriculture. Of this sum, $4,000 was appropriated for a dairy barn in 1900, and $17,500 between 1902 and 1907 for moving, remodeling and repairing the other farm buildings.

Some of the barns stood where the Agricultural Building now is, but in 1906 they were moved to the site just to the south, which they have occupied ever since.

The new farm plant will include several groups of buildings south of the Red Cedar river, on either side of Farm Lane. The dairy group, for which $97,934 is requested, will consist of a barn to house the dairy herd and young stock, a bull barn, an experimental barn and a building for feed storage.

In the beef cattle and sheep group, to cost $72,520, will be a main barn, for the breeding of beef cattle, an experimental steer feeding barn, a slaughtering plant, a main sheep barn, an experimental sheep feeding barn and several silos.

Poultry interests of the state are clamoring for a new poultry plant. To meet their wishes, $193,245 has been insluded in the budget for a poultry administration building, disease laboratory, egg laying contest houses and other equipment.

For miscellaneous farm buildings, including a barn for breeding horses, a building for storage of tools and implements, and blacksmith and repair shops, $52,340 is requested. In addition, $75,000 is asked for a new love stock judging pavilion and $32,644 for drainage, grading of land purchased or rented with option of purchase, within the last few years.

An Agricultural engineering building, to cost $150,00; a $25,000 potato experiment station to be located near Cadillac; a $10,000 laboratory for the Graham horticultural experiment station at Grand Rapids; and a $3,000 residence at the Dunbar forest station in the Upper Peninsula complete the items requested for the agricultural division, which amount to $714,683 in the aggregate.

MUSKRAT TRAPPERS REAP BIG REWARD THROUGH HIGH PRICE

Since February first, trappers have had excellent luck on their trap lines. The muskrats that are being caught are of superb quality, while the weather has been unusually favorable for trappers.

The muskrat is high, the average rats bringing about two dollars, and conditions are right. The rats have staged a remargable come back from their seeming depletion two years ago, and indications are that the rat population will benefit from the thinning out which it is receiving at the hands of the trappers ths season.

Two years ago, the catch of Michigan rats had fallen far below any previous year. From the most numerous of our fur bearing animals, it had dropped to the point where the value of the catch was no greater than skunk. Before that time, the value of the plets exceeded the value of all other Michigan furs combined. Rats were about as close to extermination as an aimal could be, trappers even admitting this.

The legislature passed a law protecting muskrats, and marshes which two years ago gave no evidence of muskrat habitation are today dotted with innumerable houses. They are prolific, breeding two and three times a year, with litters of from six to nine.

The restoration of the muskrat to its place of importance among Michigan's fur bearing animals is chiefly of commercial interest. Rats have no appeal to the vacationists or to the sportsman. When this harvest is taken at the proper time, that is, when market conditions are most favorable, there is a corresponding increase in the value of the crop to Michigan.

Had the ban on rat trapping been continued another year, it is quite possible that the rat population would have doubled or tripled, that of this season, but this would not necessarily have reacted beneficially to the trapper. The much greater harvest of rats might have had a depressing effect on market prices, the trapper would mave received no greater income.

When you pour water off boiled potatoes, save it and use instead of water or milk for your bread, sponge or coffee cake. If the water is salted you will require a little less salt in mixing the dough.

STATE PREXY FOR STUDENT "SAY-SO"

Frank discussion between students and professors, of campus problems is the keynote of a plan instituted by Dr. Kenyon L. Butterfield, president of Michigan State college, who anonunced appointment of faculty members to committees, for which George Dirks, Cooperville, president of the student council, recently named student representative.

The committees will convene at regular intervals to discuss the questionsconnected with the subject for which they were appointed, reporting back to the president with recommencations for official action. Such resolutions as are adopted and meet with the favor of Dr. Butterfield, will become informal campus rulings. Student-faculty controversies will be settled peaceably and sponsors of the new plan believe that any antagonism may be removed.

Suggestions raised at the National Student Federation of Aremica convention in December at the University of Michigan will be followed to a considerable extent.

Dean John Phelan will head the committee on the nature of the curriculum. Other faculty members are Dean E. H. Ryder, Dean G. W. Bissell, and Dean Jean Krueger. Students represented include Clude Olin, East Lansing; Keith Himebaugh, Lowell; Miss Ruth Ketcham, Hastings; and Miss Mary Mixer, Bancroft.

The committee on co-operation between faculty, undergraduates and the student government, is headed by Professor A. J. Clark. Faculty members are Dean John Prelan, Professor O. S. Dunford, Professor L. C. Emmons, Professor C. E. Millar. Student members are Miss Olga Bird, Otisville; George Dirks, Coopersville; Ivan Collett, Modesto, Cal., and William B. Spurrier, Ionia.

Members of the committee on scholarship and the honor system are: Dean Ward Giltner, chairman; Professor J. Rufi, Dr. E. A. Bessey, Professor C. W. Chapman, G. M. Burke, Paw Paw; Miss Eleanor Rainey, Birmingham; Miss Dorothy Goodson, Detroit; Stanley Hartsell, Benton Harbor; Miss Jetta Thompson, Onaway.

Professor L. C. Emmons presides over the committee on student fees and costs, which includes also; Secretary Yakley, C. O. Wilkins, Dr. R. C. Huston, Dr. R. S. Shaw, James B. Hasselman, R. W. Mayer, Ralph Young, George L. Dirks, Clyde Olin, East Lansing; Walter Neller, Lansing; Keith Himebaugh, Lowell, and Verne Stockman, East Lansing.

Anniversary day committee is composed of Professor A. J. Clark, chairman; Lieutenant Colonel T. L. Sherburne, Professor W. O. Hedrick, Lyman L. Frimodig; Paul Engel, Lansing; Gerald Reynolds, Grand Rapids; Arthur Hannah, Grand Rapids; and Norval Tyrell, Detroit.

Professor W. W. Johnson, head of the English department, will act as chairman of another committee on relationships between faculty and fraternities. Faculty members are Dean Jean Krueger and J. B. Hasselman, while students are represented by Dalter N. Norton, Port Huron; Miss Margaret Matthews, Lansing, and E. R. Hancock, Calumet.

The general committee is headed by President Butterfield and lists as its members Dr. H. R. Hunt, Mrs. Clara Powell, Professor J. T. Caswell; Miss June Ranney, Greenville; Miss Catherine Merrifield, Bangor; Miss Emma Holmes, Lansing, and Norval Tyrell, Detroit.

BOY ONCE HAUNT OF INDIANS MAGNET TO WHITE SPORTSMEN

Old Cecil Bay, which although it had been a human habitation from the days of the first Indians, according to tradition, was deserted a number of years ago after white men had stripped it of timber, is again to be populated.

Its location near the head lands of the Lower Peninsula, making the hunting territory of the Upper Peninsula easily available by canoe, the good hunting grounds just inland, and the fine stream known as the Cecil river, made the vicinity popular with the Indians. As nearly as can be determined small bands of Ottawas, Pottawatomies and Chippewas lived there within the historical period. The history of Cecil bay is ancient compared to that of most of the United States. It dates back to 1634, when the Canadian French fur trader and explorer, Jean Nicolet, first discovered Lake Michigan, and it shares that event with only a small stretch of shoreline between there and Mackinaw City. Father Marquette undoubtedly skirted the shore more than once.

For two centuries and more after those great events, the only white men to visit Cecil bay were fur traders. Beaver, pioeers say, were once plentiful and may come back under state protection.

A timber cruiser is believed first to have noticed the possibilities for a lumber mill in Cecil bay. The fine stand of pine timber and the tranquil bay, untouched by many of the storms that roughened the open lake, attracted his attention, and when the price of lumber went high enough he sought out the location. That was more than fifty years ago.

OLDEST DRUGGIST IN U. S. IN BUSINESS AT LAPEER 72 YEARS

The assertion of Shadrach N. Vincent, who recently celebrated his ninety-third birthday, that he is the oldest druggist in business in the United has not been challenged. For more than 72 years Vinvent has been a wholesale and retail dealer in drugs and medicine in Lapeer.

He also engaged in farming and had owned a saw mill and a cigar factory.

The store of S. N. Vincent and Son, is the oldest drug store conducting business under the original same head in the United States. In addition to his business affiliations, Vincent served Lapeer as postmaster for mor e than 25 years after he was appointed by President Lincoln in 1861. At one time his store housed the postoffice, telegraph and express offices. Vincent was mayor of the city a number of terms and has servedin other capacities.

The store has occupied the same location for more than 45 years and has a statewide reputation.

REPORTS QUAIL KILLED BY COLD

According to a report thousands of partridge in the upper peninsula are dying this winter because of the intense cold.

Two game officials, Gust Lithen and Paul Houlmont, recently made a 12-mile trip through the brush in the northeastern part of Iron county and found seven partridge frozen stiff.

Houlmont described their finds as follows. "I was walking along on snow shoes when I noticed a few feathers sticking out from the loose snow. I investigated and found a partridge frozen stiff. We made careful investigation to see if a weasel or some other foe had attacked the bird but there was no evidence of anything having killed the bird. Lithen and I decided to watch out for partridge roosts. You know these birds crash into the loose snow and bury themselves in snow nests nights during the winter. A hole is left which, because of its peculiar form, can easily be recognized by woodsmen. When we met one of them on the trail off to one side we made investimation. In all we found seven of them and each contained a partridge frozen stiff."

"We examined the bird in each case and found it plump and healthy and the crops of the birds were well filled with buds so that the birds are not suffering for food. After a time we came to a thicket where we found the bodies of two jays that had frozen to death on their roosts up in the balsam and had fallen off in the snow. We were then satisfied that the death of the partridge was due to intense cold and that thousands more had died from the same cause in the upper peninsula."

When we are ashamed to say a thing, we can get some relief by referring it to our imaginations.

2 MORE LIGHTS TO WARN OF MACKINAC DANGERS

Two more lights will be constructed at dangerous points along the Straits of Mackinac.

One of the lights will be built on Fourteen Foot shoal, near Cheboygan, while the other will be erected at Cordwood Point.

Present indications are that work on the new lights will be started about July 1. Both lights will be skeleton towers and connected with the power plant at Cheboygan.

Further reconstruction plans call for the rebuilding of the keepers' residence at Light House Point and the installation of generators for the operation of fog signals in case of trouble at the Cheboygan power plant.

When the new lights are in operation, it is expected that the old lights at Cheboygan Point will be discontinued.

CHURCH INFLUENCE CALLED WANING

Churches are failing in their mission in the rural districts; religious training of children of the farm districts is neglected; the influence of the country church is limited. In brief, the old fashioned "meeting house" by the cross roads is not what it used to be.

That summarizes the findings of representatives of various denominations who have completed a survey of the country church and have just made their report and recommendations. In the course of the survey community meetings were held at Potterville, Milliken, Bellevue and Vermontville. Eaton county was selected as the field for the work as a representative rural district.

Dr. Charles E. Vermilya, of the National Home Missions Council, representing 27 denominations, was the leader of the survey. The following men, representing various denominations in the county took an active part in the study: Rev. E. A. Armstrong, superintendent of home missions, Michigan conference, Methodist Episcopal church; Rev. Charles Bragg, Methodist Protestant church; Rev. C. G. Morse, Michigan Baptist convention; Rev. H. A. Simpson, assistant superintendent, Presbyterian synod of Michigan, and Rev. J. W. Sutherland, superintendent of the Michigan Congregational conference. E. T. May, Y. M. C. A. secretary of the Lansing area, joined the group for one day.

Dr. Vermilya presented the following impressions and suggestions that had come to him as a result of the study:

"I am impressed by the limited influence the churches are wielding. Too many people are in no way made conscious of the presence of work of the rural church.

The number of children neglected by religious influences is very great. The churches are largely responsible for this.

"The methods and programs of the churches are not such as to reach the uninterested or properly to serve the interested.

"The competitive policy of the past has tended to limit community consciousness to relatively few families in a limited area.

"The people are inconfusion, and the message of the church is questioned because of the emphasis on secondary or devisive matters instead of the central message of Jesus, which would call men to an obedient love for God and a wholesome love for men."

OWOSSO SCOUTS GIVEN HONORS FOR SHIAWASSEE

Stag Patrol of Troop 78, Boy Scouts of the Church of Christ, Owosso, has been designated as the most efficient troops in Shiawassee county.

In an efficiency contest extending over a period of four months, this patrol scored 12,246 points out of a possible 14,272.

During the summer, A. B. Cook, of Maple River, former state grange master, fitted up a lodge for the boys on his farm, and they have the free use of it, the only provision being that they be under the control of a scoutmaster while at the camp.

U. S. NOT TO PUT BORER QUARANTINE ON BERRIEN

Although the European corn borer has been found in Berrien county, the federal quarantine will not be sxtended for the present to include the county, according to word received from the United States Department of Agriculture at Washington.

"As to these areas, the infestation was limited to from one to sever larvae, found in each instance at a single spot," declares the department, "and no other infestation found. Furthermore, they either have been or are in the process of being radically cleaned up as to all corn, so as to eliminate any possibility of overlooking infested stalks.

"In the judgment of the federal horticultural board this situation entirely eliminates any risk of spread from these localities in connection with the movement of last year's crop."

GRANDSON PUPIL WHERE GRANDFATHER LEARNED

Several generations of Berlin township, St. Clair county, residents received their education in Distret No. 7i school. The old school, built more than 60 years ago, still serves. It is one of the few survivors of the old fashioned country schools. It may once have been "the little red school house" of song and story. It may have been almost any color in "the good old days." But today it is something else—a weather beaten shack that has outlived its many coats of paint and is literally starving for more.

Frederick Brown, five years old, is the youngest pupil now attending the school, which is taught by Miss Frances K. Wagner. Sixty years ago Frederick's grandfather was a pupil in the same school building.

ALFALFA DRIVES OPENED BY STATE IN FIVE COUNTIES

Daily alfalfa campaigns to be conducted jointly by the department of dairy husbandry and the farm crops department at Michigan State college have been planned for Kalamazoo, St. Clair, Barry, Ottawa and Berrien counties.

R. H. Addy and J. G. Hays, dairy extension specialists, will represent the dairy department. L. D. Kurtz, Paul Miller and H. C. aRther, extension specialists, will represent the farm rops department.

The campaign opened February 28 in Kalamazoo county and closes on May 21 in Berrien county. Dates are: St. Clair, March 14 to 19; Barry, March 21 to 26, and March 28 to April 3; Ottawa, May 2 to 7 and May 9 to 14; Berrien, May 16 to 21.

Here is a new way of cutting cookies that our grandmothers would not have tolerated: Do not roll and cut them out in the old way, but take the whole batch of dough, form it into a long roll, about an inch in diameter, and cut it in one-inch slices with a sharp knife. Place them in the pan two inches apart, flattening each slice slightly with the hand. The heat from the baking metls the slices to the required thickness and the cookies are perfectly round. This is quicker than the old way and there are no bits of dough left to roll again.

PURE MILK SUPPLY PUSHED BY CITIES THROUGHOUT NATION

Interest on the part of municipalities in safe milk supplies is nationwide, it is revealed by a survey made recently by the United States Department of Agriculture.

"The action of such cities as Detroit, Chicago, Cleveland and Louisville in promulgating the tuberculin test requirements has stimulated interest in this subject," says the department. "The survey showed, however, that the smaller communities also are fully as active in safe guarding their milk supplies."

A total of 874 cities and towns have ordinances requiring the tuberculin testing of cattle furnishing milk for consumption. Official reports indicate that, with the exception of about one percent, the ordinances are fairly well enforced.

In addition to the cities having tuberculin test ordinances, 375 provide an option between tuberculin testing and pasteurization. Thus a total of 1,249 municipalities have taken positive steps to safeguard their milk supplies from possibilities of disease transmission.

BORDER CLERKS BALK AT MARRIAGE FEE CUT

Clerks in border counties of Michigan, where thousands of dollars have been lost, due to a drop in the marriage business, are making a fight to have the legislature repeal the law providing for a five day wait between the time the marriage application is made and the license issued.

The law has been in force for 18 months in Michigan. Before its enactment hundreds of couples from Illinois and Indiana came to St. Joseph county to obtain marriage licenses. Also in the upper peninsula counties clerks did a prosperous business with bridegrooms who came from Wisconsin. Under the former law, licenses to non-residents could be issued without delay. Clerks reaped a harvest in fees and so did ministers who performed the marriages. The couples, too, were able to be married without publicity.

But when the five day law was adopted marriages dropped off, and today few couples come to Michigan from adjoining states to be married.

The Youthful Criminal

It is a sobering thought that among the lawbreakers of today the youthful criminal is (according to the recent census of prisoners) in the majority. It is shown in this census that most of the prisoners reported belonged to the younger age groups. Fifty two percent of those committed during the first six months, and sixty-five percent of the prison population of the last six months were between the ages of eighteen and thirty-four. In proportion to the population there were more committed from twenty-one to twenty-four years of age than in any other age group. These figures give no adequate idea of the number of youthful offenders, most of whom are committed to juvenile reformatories which are not covered in this report. The establishment of many new juvenile institutions to which are assigned the larger proportion of youthful law breakers, make these figures much less than they would be if the reformatory population was included.

If crime among the young is increasing as these figures prove, the question arises why does this condition prevail? Warden Lewis L. Lewes of Sing-Sing prison gives ten principal reasons why young men become criminals: First, heredity; improper home training; third, inadequate schooling; fourth, insufficient recreation; fifth, gambling sixth, bad company; seventh, liquor and drugs; eighth, false pride ninth, disrepect for law; tenth, high cost of living.

City Judge Charles W. Boote of Yonkers, New York, names the reasons why delinquency is on the increase among girls. First, improper home atmosphere; second, no religious training; third, promiscuous automobile riding; fourth, love of luxury; fifth, liquor; sixth, movies of wrong type; seventh, lack of sex modesty; eighth, boys with too much money; ninth, immodest dancing; tenth, trashy novels.

It is the type of young people who are easily influenced and led into loose ways of living and acting, who develop badly because of the easy descent to wrong doing, that are degenerated by such influences.

The laxity and postponement of punishment also encourages crime. Punishment is meted out for several reasons. One theory is that society is taking revenge for the wrong doing; that it is to keep the criminal from further endangering the community, and doing further wrong; that it is for the salvation of the criminal that he may be educated and reformed; and most important of all that his punishment may be a lesson for others starting out in the same path and act as a deterrent to them.

The lack of quick and severe punishment in the case of two young criminals is said to have led to another crime when two eighteen year old girls were arrested for assisting two boys of sixteen and nineteen to cruelly kill an old woman whose money they coveted. A boy and a girl nineteen years old were arrested for highway robbery the robbery failed by accident from being a murder; the girl when arrested said, "I'm sorry I didn't get away with it; if I had had more experience I would have."

A writer on crime tells of his talk with a police chief who had once been a railroad detective. He told of eight boys ranging in ages from seven to twelve whom he caught, while employed by the railroad, stealing small loads of coal from the railroad yards. The judge was a tender hearted facetious old person who said to the boys, "I am going to discharge you boys, your family probably needed the coal and that is why you took it. But the railroad stole it anyhow from the people. I won't even put you on probation." The railroad detective whispered to the judge and said, "Please do not give out the impression that boys in that district can get away with coal stealing. Coal stealing is the beginning. If the boys think they can break the law it will be a regular breeding ground for criminals. I don't want these boys sent up, but there should be some punishment for them." The judge laughed indulgently and replied, "Punishment won't cure those boys," and waved his hand. Twenty years later in the course of a few years' service as police chief the old detective saw five of these eight boys and a dozen others from their neighborhood sent to the penitentiary for felony. Proper punishment of the boys who stole the coal would have proved a deterrent to the other boys in that neighborhood.

"Upon the character of its children, the destiny of any nation depends." What will be the future of our nation if it must depend upon the character and deeds of a large portion of the growing children of today? The boy with the hip pocket flask, the too-ready gun the high speed automobile, and the immature mind inflamed with visions of illegal conquests; the girl with the cigaret, the immodest dress and posture, the willingness to aid and abet in ill-advised and evil adventures—these are poor material with which to build up a great nation. A change must be brought about or the nation will not only suffer but will be destroyed morally and physically.

The Fatal Mistakes

The three sad-faced nurses in Chicago who by mistake administered boric acid wash to little babies in the hospital thinking the acid was distilled water have had their lesson, and the example will probably serve as a disciplineary measure to others of the profession who might be inclined to get care free and reckless. From the evidence taken it would seem the doctor who fixed the solution and placed it in a container similar to the one frequently used for distilled water ought to come in for his share of the blame. To have two containers in a hospital anything like each other for such widely different uses ought to be a criminal offense. Of course the authorities must make a show at severity and must call the three unfortunate young women to account on the witness stand—otherwise the world might get the impression that poisoning helpless babes was some sort of amusement practiced by hospital attaches in Chicago,

Farm Bureau Legislative News

As the 1927 session of the Legislature reaches the half way mark there are indications that intense battles over some old issues will soon be making things very interesting.

At the big public hearing held before the Road and Bridges committee of the House all the measures proposing changes in the State highway finance laws were debated pro and con. All of those who spoke were earnestly in favor of seeing Michigan's highway program continued without curtailment and were further agreed as to the justice of the gasoline tax as a measure of the amount of the contribution which each motorist should make toward highway construction ane maintenance. The Farm Bureau recommends the Town and Straunch bills with amendments lessening the rate on light trucks. These bills provide for a 4c gas tax and $5 permanent license plates for passenger cars and annual weight tax on trucks and busses and the return of two million dollars additional of highway funds back to the counties.

Senator Horton's bill to require hunters to obtain the written permission of the owner or occupant before trespassing on farm lands is still in the Senate Committee on Conservation. Senator Horton reports that the many letters being received by various Senators in favor of this bill are developing considerable support.

A five mill tax on the face value of all foreign bonds and other such evidences of indebtedness is provided in a bill introduced in the House by Rep. William J. Thomas of Grand Rapids. Similar measures have been before the Legislature during recent sessions and one year such a bill was passed but vetoed by Governor Grosbeck. This measure is intended to lessen the burden of the general property tax by reducing the amount of tax exempt securities.

Proposing to "take the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction out of politics," Senator Tom Reed of Shelby and Rep. Joseph Warner of Ypsilanti have introduced identical measures which would provide that the head of the state's educational system would be appointed for a two year term by the Board of Education instead of being elected at the polls.

Protection for farmers' livestock against bears and vicious dogs is being considered. A measure setting up requirements for the killing of dogs by legal process when complaints are registered by farmers whose stock has been damaged, was introduced by Rep. John E. Gillett of Rapid City. Rep. Fred R. Ming of Cheboygan proposes that farmers would be reimbursed for damages done to their livestock by bears. The State Conservation Department would provide the money out of its game protection funds.

Identical bills proposing interesting amendments to the gas tax law which would materially benefit the counties with small valuations were introduced in the Senate by Sen. Albert J. Engel of Lake City and in the House by Rep. H. Earl McNitt of Cadillac. These measures would impose an additional cent gasoline tax. During the balance of this year the extra revenue would be used to pay the past due awards owed to the several counties. Beginning with 1928 this new revenue would be apportioned equally among the 83 counties in the state, provided that they submitted a program of proposed improvements satisfactory to the State Highway Department and complied with certain other regulations.

The Chicken Thief Imbroglio

Again we are called upon to mix in the chicken thief shooting at Greeuville. Let us say in beginning that there is too much propaganda over a comparatively infinatesimal affair which would not have been heard of outside Montcalm county if the farm papers had not took it up. Speaking of the great hue and cry far and wide all over Michigan because a worthless iron moulder was sent to his reward by a perfectly respectable farmer of the same town—it might be referred to as a tremendous effort from a terribly small matter or a "tempest in a teapot" to use a farmer's term.

One of our subscribers walked into the office and insinuated that he wanted to know what we think of the case. Well, neighbor, it makes little difference what one little country weekly thinks of the case, for it will be tried just the same, unless you can change the laws of Michigan..

Tho Bible seys "Thou Shalt not Kill" and the laws of most civilized nations are based on the scriptures, but we find seeping into the usage of American peoples a revised edition of the Good Book that says might is right, and in the pre limiuaries of the World War the Huns invaded poor little Belgium and tore her limb from limb becanse the Huns were a law unto themselves, anc we got an object lesson of brute force as opposed to law. This was brought about by the crazy teachings of fanatical professors of German universities, wherein the "Kaiser and Gott" theory evoluted into another worse nightmare of "Kaiser Bill" with Gott eliminated entirely. The unwritten law is "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" and that's the philosophy used by Mr. Wilson when he transgressed the laws of Michigan and executed the iron moulder, only to come out of it with a blanched consciousness of having gone against the laws of his state, which justice very sternly forbids and which the allied nations nipped in the bud.

Men have been tried before juries and acquitted for using the unwritten law, and every time this has occnrred, the constitution of Michigan was disgraced.

We presnme the Wilson case is only one of many, and no doubt the crooks and thieves are watching it closely, and they are hoping for some kind of a decision that will in a measure protect them but none of them are expecting to be protected by Wilson's conviction. We have no use for a chicken thief and a lawyer who would pretend to defend one ought to go to the penitentiary with his clieut, nor have we any sympathy with the family of the dead thief. Their suit for damages will be a parody, but the taking of human life by one not so authorized by law, is another matter. We can't afford to drag the law under foot. Mr. Wilson might better enter Jackson for murder and thus uphold the statutes, than to encourage the taking of a life by the rabble. Please do not get the idea that we cater to chicken stealing—far from it.

We wish Mr. Wilson had added a connection to his chicken coop whereby 12,000 volts of electricity would have shot through the iron moulder's body when he broke in—thus making the thief his own executioner. Nobody would be interested—not even the Ferm Bureau, except possibly to recommend the device to its other members.

A Trip To The Old World

One of the finest pilgrimages which we have learned about lately is the expected trip which the American Federated Farm Bureau will make in July from New York City on one of the most palatial ocean liners of the day. They expect to embark about July 30th 1927 and the trip is open to every member of the Farm Bureau and their friends. The trip will cover most of the countries of Europe—Island of Jersey, Denmark, Germany, Holland, Belgium, France and England. Several side trips can be arranged for at slight additional expense. The price of the trip is $320 and this includes hotel fare transportation on boat and from place to place and practically all the expenses except the passport fees from different countries, which we imagine is no small matter. Probably 500 members of the Farm Bureau will take the trip and all arrangements can be made by communicating with The Farm Bureau Federation 58 East Washington street Chicago Illinois.

We have no special desire to advertise this junket but we believe that any farmer in comfortable circumstances who can leave his farming operations with trusty hands, is indeed very foolish if he does not take in this trip. The education alone from it would be worth thousands of dollars both in actual information on expert breeding practice and historic lore. Many of the finest breeds of horses and cattle originated in the countries mentioned and the visitor will be enabled to ascertain how the high class strains of thorough bred cattle and horses are obtained and maintained. Belgium is especially popular in horse raising Denmark is an authority on dairy breeds of cows as is also Holland. The small outlay comparatively for this extensive sight-seeing junket would never be missed.

The School of Political Economy

The farmers are not a little satisfied in this section as regards the president's veto of the McNary—Haugen bill—they are right down mad. Well, boys it is not possible to change the powers behind the throne at Washington until 1929, and it is figured that when the four years are ended there will be so many new angles to the farm question that the farm opposition to Coolidge's policies will be forgotten. We are not surprised the Democrats are making great capital out of it. It's none or never with these boys.

We have noticed that our cautious President is a Roman in every sense of the word—he goes mighty slow on some lines, and his slowness may hide an awful good skit for all we know. It may be possible he will see to it a proper bill is fathered in the House that hits the case, "with justice towards all and malice to none." Whatever the case you can gamble on this; Calvin Coolidge with his Yankee divining rod is not expecting to O. K. any bills which are suspiciously expensive to tax payers. He has consented to a heavy cut in appropriations for Naval purposes, and his first name is "economy." Some Democratic big mouths are now yelling their heads off because President and Mrs. Coolidge are moving into a mansion in Washington where the furnishings alone cost $400,000 and at the same time our Government is making repairs to the White House which will cost approximately the same figure, but it simmers down to this fact: Taken all in all we have become so Democratic in our ways that the national buildings and our executive mansion is so shabby and so dilapidated beside the poorest of foreign capitals we are ashamed of it, and foreign diplomats who know the comparison are poking all manner of fun at us. So it is more than likely the President has wallowed in squalor (figuratively speaking) already much longer than good common sense would dictate. The huge joke going the rounds now is that the farmers are saying they must educate the Honorable President—he is a little crass on farm affairs.

Uncle Sam and His Nephews, the States, Are Collecting Over a Billion Dollars in Yearly Tolls on Motor Vehicles and Fuel

More Than Meets the Nation's Billion Dollar Highway Building Bill—Thomas H. MacDonald, Chief of the U. S. Bureau of Public Roads, Tells Striking Details.

By JUDSON C. WELLIVER

America has reverted to the ancient system of collecting tolls wherewith to build and maintain highways.

In 1925 these tolls amounted to $1,094,000,000, collected through motor licenses, gasoline taxes, property, corporation, income production and other taxes on automobiles, automobile manufactures, the petroleum industry, etc.

In the same year $1,003,000,000 was spent on rural roads. It took near a century to build $20,000,000,000 worth of railroads. A highway system costing that much will be created in twenty years at present rate.

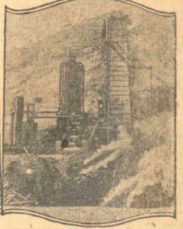
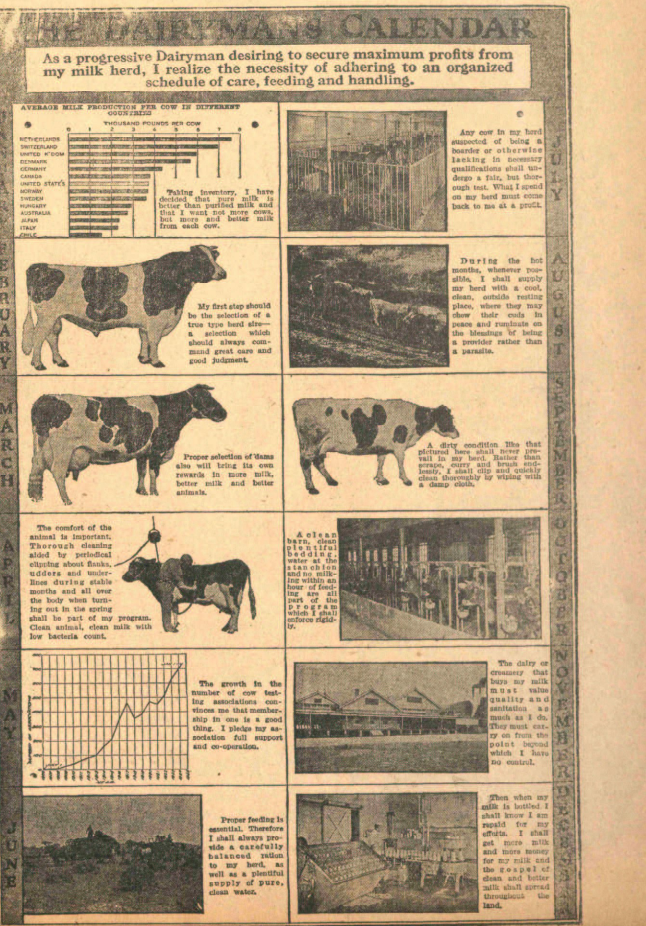
MR. HILLS IMPROMPTU SKETCH OF AN OIL DOME



EXPERIMENTAL OIL SHALE REDUCTION PLANT

The U. S. Bureau of Mines is confident that motor fuel supplies will be ample for many years to meet all needs of the country's millions of automobiles. Harry H. Hill, chief petroleum engineer of the Bureau, here tells the reasons for this conviction, and sketches the advances in industrial methods which justify his opinions.

By HARRY H. HILL



As a progressive Dairyman desiring to secure maximum profits from my milk herd, I realize the necessity of adhering to an organized schedule of care, feeding and handling.

Taking inventory, I have decided that pure milk is better than purified milk and that I want not more cows, but more and better milk from each cow.

My first step should be the selection of a true type herd sire—a selection which should always command great care and good judgment.

Proper selection of dams also will bring its own rewards in more milk, better milk and better animals.

The comfort of the animal is important. Thorough cleaning aided by periodical clipping about flanks, udders and underlines during stable months and all over the body when turning out in the spring shall be part of my program. Clean animal, clean milk with low bacteria count.

The growth in the number of cow testing associations convinces me that membership in one is a good thing. I pledge my association full support and co-operation.

Proper feeding is essential. Therefore I shall always provide a carefully balanced ration to my herd, as well as a plentiful supply of pure, clean water.

Any cow in my herd suspected of being a boarder or otherwise lacking in necessary qualifications shall undergo a fair, but thorough test. What I spend on my herd must come back to me at a profit.

During the hot months, whenever possible, I shall supply my herd with a cool, clean, outside resting place, where they may chew their cuds in peace and ruminate on the blessings of being a provider rather than a parasite.

A dirty condition like that pictured here shall never prevail in my herd. Rather than scrape, curry and brush endlessly, I shall clip and quickly clean thoroughly by wiping with a damp cloth.

A clean barn, clean plentiful bedding, water at the stanchion and no milking within an hour of feeding are all part of the program which I shall enforce rigidly.

The dairy or creamery that buys my milk must value quality and sanitation as much as I do. They must carry on from the point beyond which I have no control.

Then when my milk is bottled I shall know I am repaid for my efforts. I shall get more milk and more money for my milk and the gospel of clean and better milk shall spread throughout the land.

ANIMALS ADDED TO HOLLAND ZOO

Talk about managing prima donnas and soothing the artistic temperament of sensitive souls! That isn't to e compared with the management of a veritale ark full of exotic animals that must e cared for through the cold of a northern winter far from their native jungles of Ceylon, Singapore, West Africa and the South American forests.

But such is the job entrusted to the manager, the naimal man, the gardener and a company of 18 or 20 men employed by George F. Getz, of Chicago, on his magnificent estate, Lakewood Farm, just north of Holland, during the winter.

While the familiar landscape is under several feet of snow, the boa constrictor is upsaire in the barnfi where the temperature has to bept at a nice tropical degree of 90 above zero. The boa constrictor, after the manner of pythons, is shedding its skin in thin, dessicated bits all over the straw, to get a bright new coat for next summer when the visitors begin to arrive at Lakewood Farm.

Downstairs in the barn, at a pleasant summer warmth of 65 or 70 degrees, Nancy, the elephant takes her daily exercise up and down the floor, or stays chained to a staple in her corner. Nancy munches apples and hay these days and dreams of a summer diet of hay and peanuts.

Likewise in their cages do "Rajah" and "Sheba," the handsome Singapore tigers, wait for summer when they will be transferred to an out door pen. Only the little black Mayalan bears, Toby, Togo and Tazy, brave the cold out of doors. A big new pen waits for the 2,500 pound buffalo, now in the zoo at Lincoln Park, Chicago. This buffalo is the largest in existence.

For everybody in this neighborhood, as well as many people in Detroit, and others in all quarters of the globe, know the marvels of Lakewood Farm, or the "Getz farm," a 300-acre establishment on the shore of Lake Michigan. Extending from the reclaimed dune land at the shore of the lake, the estate includes 40 acres of garden and lawn, with the balance in orchards, woodlands and fields. From June to October each year, such is the public spirit of Mr. Getz, certain sections of the grounds centering about the zoo are thrown open to the public.

This year a young lion, the big buffalo, a pair of rare black leopards and other animals will arrive to swell the company and add to the value of the zoo.

"Charley" Jackson, whose cozy bungalow home is just west of the entrance gate, is manager of the farm, with Jack Peterson as animal man and Andy Cedar holm as head gardener.

Cedarholm has been at the farm for 10 years and Jackson has been there for the same period, having begun his career in the employ of Mr. Getz as driver of one of his coal wagons more than 20 years ago.

PEACH CROP SHORT IN STATE, FORECAST; WARMTH IS FEARED

Michigan peaches will be a short crop this year, it is indicated by a preliminary survey in orchards. There is a great deal of winter injury to the peach buds in Western Michigan. It is estimated that only 10 per cent live fruit buds remain in many large archards inthe Grand Rapids section. The same condition exists at other inland points, according to H. D. Hootman, secretary of the Michigan State Horticultural Society.

Reports from along the east shores of Lake Michigan indicate the damage to peach buds has been ilght thus far, although many buds in some blocks show symptoms of having been touched by the cold. The injury was lighter as a result of the tempering influence of the lake upon the winds which swept over the state.

Growers near the lake are not as much concerned over the winter injury to peaches as they are about the prospects of an early spring. Much of the fruit belt in Western Michigan has been snowless this winter and the recent spring-like weather threatened to start the fruit buds. It did start the sap to flowing in the maple trees Fruit growers fear history is going to repeat itself with an early spring, as in 1921, when freezing temperatures caught fruit trees in full bloom and greatly shortened the production.

ICE BRAVED FOR MICHIGAN MAIL

Heroism, hardihood, skill and daring enter into Uncle Sam'c maintenance of winter mail service to Michigan islands.

A glance at a map of the state and its surrounding waters will indicate what a tremendous task the government undertakes. Thirty-two miles of shifting, and therefore treacherous ice stretches between the post office at Charlevoix to Beaver Island and its surrounding satellites.

At Leland, which is four miles beyond the end of the railroad line running through the center of Leelanau county, Elmer Dalton, the postmaster, sends letters and packages across 12 miles of water.

Bois Blanc island, where one life has been lost in delivering the mail, is served from Cheboygan. South Manitou, in Lake Michigan, gets its mail from Glen Haven. Dogs hitched to sleds are Uncle Sam's messengers from the Mackinac post office to Mackinac Island. If the people of South Fox Island want their mail they go to Northport, in Leelanau county for it. North Fox Island is uninhabited.

The most difficult situation faced by the government is that in connection with the delivery of the mail to the more than 1000 winter inhabitants of Beaver Island, famous in state history as the stronghold of King Strang, last of the lake pirates, and his Mormon colony. How close we of this generation are to our background is illustrated by the fact that in Charlevoix today lives the son of the man who shot the Mormon king as the latter was being taken to the boat for trial on treason and piracy charges in Detroit.

Beaver Island lies 32 miles northwest of Charlevoix. During the summer, daily boat service is maintained between it and mainland. When the season of navigation closes, about the middle of December, a special contract must be made by Captain George W Weaver, the postmaster, with a sailor of resource and courage to carry the mail in an ice-crushing vessel through floating bergs and fields of ice.

Such a man has been found during the last few years in Captain John McCann, an Irishman said to be afraid of nothing on the lakes, a native of Beaver Island and once the captain of the City of Boyne, running from Charlevoix to Bay City. Captain McCann's son, Roland, who accompanies him on the hazardous journey, served five years in the American navy during the World War. The engineer, George La Blanc, who also is a Berver Islander, is nephew of one of the unsung heroes of Michigan's postal apics—Joseph La Blanc, who lost his life carrying the mail from Cheboygan to Bois Blanc Island.

The Venus, though named for the goddess of beauty, is no doggess for looks. But on the last trip of the season (made before the ice closed to make boat passage to Beaver impossible) she smashed five miles of almost solid ice at the entrance to the harbor at St. James.

It was George La Blanc's uncle, Joseph La Blanc, who, one Christmas eve, was so anxious to get back to him family on Bois Blanc Island that he disregarded the warnings of Cheboygan friends and started over on the ice with the mail. He and his partner lost their bearings in the storm which suddenly arose. La Blanc dropped in his tracks as the result of the cold and weariness.

His companion placed him, dead, on the sled with the mail, finally found shelter on a small island and, himself near collapse from exposure, went within a shanty to builda fire and get warm by it. When he got back the apparently solid ice had broken. Sled, mail and dead man were carried away. No trace was ever foun dof them.

With Lake Michigan tossing huge chunks of ice high up in the air, real seamanship is required to make the narrow entrance to the small river at Leland where the boats find refuge.

PRICES EXPECTED TO BRING BIG SPUD CROP

Two years of the high potato prices and two years of low bean prices may result in the increase in the average planted to potatoes in Michigan this year, in the opinion of leaders in the tuber industry.

Sales of certified seed potatoes indicate a tendency to plant more potatoes, particularly in certain sections where beans have been grown extensively for two years. Seed stocks have been moving briskly. The movement of Feb. 1 is said to have been the heaviest in the history of the indunstry.

Many farmers quit growing seed af-after the over-production and low prices two years ago. Now they are jumping back in and are buying certified seed potatoes for foundation stock.

Seed potatoes are bringing the greatest premiums over table stock in the history of the industry, selling at $2 to $2.25 a bushel, compared with 85 to 90 cents for table stock.

BIG 10 MEETING SEEN BY YOST AS ATHLETIC AID

"I think the so-called Big Ten meeting held in Chicago did more to benefit Western Conference athletics than any meeting ever held before," declared Fielding H. Yost, Michigan's athletic director.

"It was the first time in the history of intercollegiate athletics that all the varied interests met to discuss common problems. We got the angles of directors, faculty, coaches, alumni and students and out of it drew all into closer bonds of sympathy and understanding.

Among the definite things accomplished, according to Yost, were first an answer to the question: "Should there be more or fewer men engaged in intercollegiate athletics?" The answer indicated plainly that broadening and not restricting was what is desired.

OAKLAND COUNTY TO OUTFIT LABORATORY

Complete laboratory service will be offered Oakland county physicians through the establishment of a laboratory by the county's health department. It will be located in the county hospital, with Miss Margaret Schofield, former state department of health worker, in charge as bacteriologist. Dr. John D. Monroe, county physician, is planning to establish collection stations in the various villages to afford expeditious service.

BROTHERS UNITED AFTER ROW, 'NEATH SHOWER OF HONEY

The brothers Farnsworth met at Manchester and Woodward avenues, Highland Park after a quarrel which had kept them separated for several years.

Both are farmers, Silas, who is 40, was driving a load ofhoney into town from Otisville when he lost control of the truck in Woodward avenue near Manchester. With its driver frantically trying to subdue it the truck climbed the curb, demolishing a "no parking" sign and narrowly missing a score of scared pedestrians as it caromed down the sidewalk.

But at Manchester avenue came the crash that had seemed for several minutes inevitable. The mad truck tilted and collapsed, rumping its rich cargo over an amazed sightseer who, uninformed of its approach, had been standing on the corner viewing the towering stacks of the Ford Motor Co.'s plant.

Silas Farnsworth abandoned his truck and accompanied his victim, who was in such a state as to be not easily identified, to the Highland Park General Hospital.

Under the honey he found his brother, Leland Farnsworth, 38, who had come to town, only to be "stuck up," as he declared, by his own brother. He was scratched and bruised, but not injured seriously.

In this fashion were the brothers Farnsworth reunited. They returned, arm in arm, to the scene of the sweet encounter.

STATE WAR VETS FACE LAPSING OF BILLION INSURANCE

One billion dollars in government life insurance is still being allowed to "go to seed" by 124,000 Michigan war veterans, says Luther E. Ellis, chief of the U. S. Veterans' bureau, stationed in Detroit.

Congress last June made the final extension until July 2 of this year for reinstatement of these policies. In 1926 Ellis reinstated policies totaling $6,500,000, and such reinstatement was in accord with the new act providing a five year term for the policies.

Of the $40,000,000,000 in policies issued during the war, only 25 per cent are in effect today, the balance having been allowed to lapse despite the government 'sefforts to care for the veterans at cost, says Ellis.

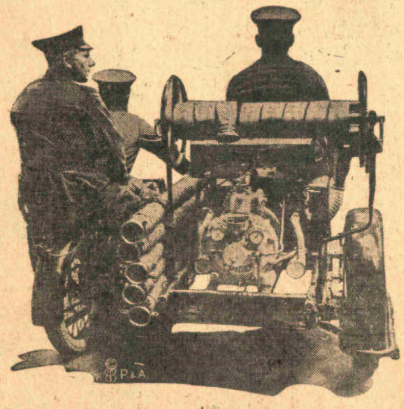
Germans' Latest---A "Motorcycle Fire-Engine"



Here's a sort of take-off on our motorcycle-side car combination. Only where we have the familiar "bath-tub" attachment, the Germans have substil tuted a fulllequipped fire engine. It is said to have been found quite practical and speedy by the Berlin fire department. Oh, yes—the engine can also be detached and run on its own power.

WHITE DEER HERD ON GRAND ISLAND

Roaming the heavily forested area of Grand Island, that water bound isolated paradise for wild life lying athwart the entrance of one of the few deep bays on the south shore of Lake Superior, is or should be a dozen or more pure white albion deer. They are the remnant of that magnificent conception and experiment of that great naturalist, George Shiras IIII, in the forming of a herd of albino deer, an experiment lige the proberial surgeon's statement in which "the operation was successful but the patient died."

George Shires did succeed in forming a hterd of albino deer, but disease crept in and finally destroyed most of the herd. "At that time," writes Mr. Shires, "there were about 15 white deer, and before the trouble arose, we expected to have about 30 deer within the next year and a half than then some more to be deleased to roam at large on the island and others to be distributed in the state parks."

To avoid total extermination, the entire herd was turned at large. The deer have since been carefully protected against shooting, and back in their native haunts they undoubtedly have produced a progeny that is of particular interest today.

While disease stepped in and prevented conception, the experiment was carried on long enough to proce a question which interested naturalists the world over. It was found that in the breeding of alminos, where both sexes were white, the offspring were invariably of the same solor, but when the white buck bred with the red doe the offspring averaged about 50-50. This condition prevailing on the island, it is natural to suppose that a considerable number of pure as well as partial albino deer are today running there at large.

The story of Grand Island's herd of albino deer is an interesting one. It was in 1905 that Shiras had word that a fine albino buck had been seen frequently coming to a little pond on the easterly side of the island.

For two usmmer seasons he spent days and nights in quest of a picture of this freak of animal life, only to learn that a Detroit hunter had shot the buck. It had been mounted by a Detroit taxidermist and from the age of the specimen evidenced, the naturalist was confident that white descendants would sometime be found.

Close watch was kept and finally, in the fall of 1915, a good sized albino buck was seen loitering about box traps set for capturing deer. With little effort it was taken. Upon hemoval to prepared quarters it was found that the buck was suffering from an injury to its spine and was unable to stand, but given every care and attention possible, it recovered, was soon able to stand and by spring was in normal condition.

A few weeks later a female white fawn was found in a thicket, brought up on a bottle and the opportunity for the formation of a herd was possible. This fawn, when found had the covering of white spots usually found on any deer fawn, although in this case they were the same color as the rest of its coat, appearing more as a pressed design such as one notices on a clear white designed damask cloth. The following year a red doe gave birth to an albion doe fawn, which, however, lacked the delicate spotted markings.

In the spring of 1919 one Captain Poe Stephenson, of the Soo, was trout fishing on one of the streams in the upper peninsula, when he found in a thicket beside the stream, a newly born pure albino doe fawn.

You can save a lot of coal by shutting the drafts before the fire gets red. If you once let it burn to its full heat without checking, some of the coal will melt and form clinkers and then you can get no heat worth mentioning in the oven until you have either raked out the clinkers or built a new fire. It is building a new frei that takes the coal.

DETROIT GIRL IS CHOSEN MOST BEAUTIFUL IN STATE

"The most beautiful girl in Michigan," according to Chicago taste, is Miss LaVerne Reynolds, of Detroit, who won the first prize of $1,000 in a contest conducted by a Chicago paper. Miss Reynolds is 21 years old, born in Stambaugh, Mich., and is employed as a stenographer by W. W. Hole, Detroit general agent for the Southern Pacific lines. She says she will send her contest winnings to her widowed mother and 13-year-old brother in Stambaugh.

COOLIDGE ACTS TO GIVE DETROIT MARINE HOSPITAL

President Coolidge has asked Congress for $19,878,700, to initiate the Administration's public building program.

This is the sum required for the first year of the $215,000,000 program for new public buildings throughout the countfy.

The money would be made available during the fiscal year beginning next July 1. Director Herbert M. Lord, of the budget, in transmitting the request to the Speaker of the House, attached a detailed list of expenditures contemplated for the first year. It includes, at Detroit, a marine hospital, $120,000 and $75,000 for construction at Pontiac.

WOMAN PERFECTS CORN FOR SEED FOR NORTH

Woman's place may be in the home, but Mrs. Kate L. Reinsch has proved that it may also be in the fields. On her farm a few miles south of Manistee, Mrs. Reinsch has succeeded in acclaiming a popular variety of yellow corn to the extent that it may be grown for seed in that district. This corn was heretofore grown only in the corn belt farther to the south, and little if any corn was grown for the seed alone thus far north in Michigan.

IDEAS SWAPPED BY OAKLAND FARMERS

Like farmers the world around, the farmers of Highland Township, in Oakland county, have never been known as book worms.

Their patient collaboration with sun and soil, their shrewd observation of things about them, their ability to judge fundamental values, have made them—as these qualities have made farmers everywhere—social and political balance wheels, swinging gently between radicalism and conservatism.

But when a farmer comes in from a day spent in wind and weather and tries to read, he straightway begins to feel an unconquerable drowsiness. Tired muscles insist on putting the brain to sleep.

And so, in learning how to keep their minds active for a few hours in the evening, the farmers of Highland Township have done a revolutionary thing. It is not the perusing of books which keep them wakeful. Nor is it listening to the radio which causes them to stay up late of nights. It is crossing their wits with their fellows in discussion of community problems.

In the old days there were debating societies in the country districts. But somehow the people lost interes. in them.

Perhaps the experience of the Highland farmers points a new path to neighborhood understanding, which is fundamental to all co-operative effort.

The Highland farmers began to "winnow wisdom out of experience" about five years ago, when three young men, Foster Gaunt, Lucius Lyons and Sheldon Latourette, each a leader of a boys' 4-H club, bet with George H. Kimball, Jr., of Pontiac, county Y. M. C. A. secretary, to talk over the problems of the boys in the community.

They decided to meet once a month. The group began to grow. Its members discussed many things besides boys' club work. Gradually it attracted more and more of the thoughtful men of the community until it became what it is now, a study group and forum, where all sorts ofquestions and problems relatingto the community may be threshed out.

LIVING COSTS IN DETROIT HIGHEST IN UNITED STATES

Living costs in Detroit are still highest in the country as compared with 1914, according to figures prepared by the Bureau of Labor statistics.

The cost of living in Detroit, as of December, 1926, was 84.1 per cent above what it was in December, 1914, the statements say. No other city still maintained such a high level. Those which vied with Detroit in having living costs 80 per cent or more above 1914 prices were Buffalo, Cleveland, Jacksonville, New York and Philadelphia.

Nevertheless Detroit prices have fallen 22 per cent since June of 1920, the peak year, and 2 per cent since December, 1925. Only two other cities, Portland, Ore., and Savannah, Ga., have experienced a greater reduction in living costs since 1920.

In addition, Detroit was among the eight cities, out of 32 surveyer by the bureau, to enjoy a reduction of living costs since June of last year. This reduction in the case of Detroit amounted to three-tenths of one per cent.

FORD SEES 20-DAY YEAR FOR FARMERS TO RAISE FULL CROP

Henry Ford believes that the work of producing any of the staple crops, to which a farmer now gives a year, could easily be done in 20 days or less with thorough organization, intensive specialization, and the aid of labor-saving machinery.

He has purchased land on which he will try out his theories, and which he will operate as a demonstration farm open to the public when he has "anything to show that is worth seeing."

"His estimate would allow two days for the plowing and harrowing that must be done before planting; one day for the planting itself; for cultivation during growth five days, and two days for harvesting and threshing, which can now be done simultaneously by a machine which cuts, threshes and bags the wheat as it is drawn through the field by a tractor. The total of the time thus allocated would be 10 days, which is only half of Mr. Ford's estimate and would leave another 10 days for ditching, fencing, distributing fertilizer and doing any other work fairly chargeable to the cost of producing a particular crop.

And then he went on to reaffirm his faith in the salvation of agriculture by labor-saving machinery, intensive specialization and efficient organization.

NEW SCOUT HEAD PREFERS BOYS TO STRICTLY BUSINESS

"Boys and business mix fine—but one must watch or he will be given too much time to the boys and not enough to the business."

That is the conclusion reached by William H. Mills, recently elected Scout Commissioner of the Detroit Council, Boy Scouts of America, after 16 years' participation in the Scout movement.

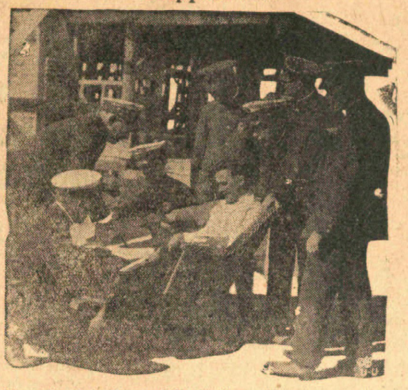
"Uncle Billy" Mills, as he is known to the Scouts of Detroit, believes in boys. He believes in them to the extent that for 10 years he gave every Friday night, every Saturday afternoon, all of his vacations and many other eveinings in addition to his boys.

"There isn't any boy that is all bad. He may be mischievous, he may be full of fun and deviltry, but he isn't all bad," "Uncle Billy" said.

"Most boys are honest and square and you must be that way with them. It doesn't pay to try to bluff a boy and there's no one who can tell a four-flusher quicker than a boy. $f a boy asks you something that you know nothing about, better tell him you don't know, for he will find out soon enough that you don't."

Detroit's new scout commissioner began his work with boys in Philadelphia. In February 1911, a year after the Boy Scouts of America had been incorporated.

Policemen Turn "Bricklayers" to Help Crippled Pal



Officer Russel I. Young of Van Nuys, Calif.—paralyzed from the waist down in an accident while on duty—now really knows the value of friendship. Fifty fellow cops of his rolled up their sleeves, donned overalls, and built him a cozy bungalow in their spare time.

Patrolmen, sergeants and even the chiefs of Van Nuys and neighboring communities pitched into the work "with a will" and, in one day, completed frame work, fireplace and roof of the new home for the Young family. At last reports, the dwelling was well nigh completion and the young, unfortunate officer was just waiting to take possession—free of rent worries forever.

TAX HIGHER THAN LAND COST STATE

Four years ago a group of Muskegon men persuaded the legislature to appropriate $25,000 to buy 845 acres skirting Muskegon Bay for a state park. Representations were made that the land was worth far core than $25,000 and could be considered to be in part a gift to the state. These representations were not then, or are they now, questioned. The state paid the $25,000, got deeds of the land and it is now known as the Muskegon State Park.

Now, the Muskegon County highway engineer called on Auditor General Dramel B. Fuller and handed him a bill for $167,631.41, which he explained is the state's portion of the cost of building two highways under the Covert Road act, one road through the park, the other adjoining it. The Covert law, enacted about 10 years ago, provides that two or more counties, or parts thereof, may form an assessment district to build roads, the cost of such roads to be met by levying taxes on all the real estate in the district, including state parks. It is the only act on the statute books that provides for taxing state parks, or any other class of state property.

After the state paid the $25,000 for the 845 acres, a Covert road assessment district was created to build the two highways mentioned. The park is wholly within the district. The presentation of the bill for $167,631.41 to Auditor General Fuller was his first information that such an indebtedness existed. A few days ago he made a list of the taxes he knew had been levied against state parks under the Covert act, and that are unpaid, and the amount totaled only about $12,000. He told the Muskegon representative to itemize and re-submit it, which will be done.

Mr. Fuller says that by the terms of the Covert act the bill is a valid one, even though none of the state officials who had a part in acquiring the park in 1923 for $25,000 had even a remote thought then that four years later the state would be called on to pay a highway tax.

"APE MAN" PROVES TO BE OWOSSO'S MUSICAL SWAIN

Fears of residents in the north part of Owasso residents for weeks a year ago by prowling around nights and in several instances trying to force entrance to homes where women and children were alone, had returned, were allayed when a policeman found that the cause of the neighborhood's fears was a high school student serenading his sweetie with a saxophone.

Neighbors had told police of hearing outlandish noises and seeing a man hanging around a great deal at night. The officer found the boy in front of the girl's house.

WINTER PLAYGROUND IS HOPE OF WOLVERINES

Active steps have been taken toward making Western Michigan a national playground during the winter as well as the summer. Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois and Minnesota are to be asked to join in the program for the development of the Great Lakes region as a winter sports center, while organized events for the summer are contemplated also by the Development League of Western Michigan.

Among summer events proposed are marathon swimming races. Present plans call for one swimming race from Grand Haven to Muskegon, July 4, 1927. This is a distance of 15 miles.

Sixteen counties affiliated with the league in Western Michigan are to be asked to send delegates to a meeting at which plans will be made for arranging a winter sports program. Iceboating, skating, skiing, tobogganing, and sail-skating are some of the winter sports to be included in the program.

It is planned to have elimination contests and then have the champions of one state meet those of another.

Several cities of Western Michigan already have arranged winter sports programs.

DEARTH OF SNOW IN STATE SAVES FOTRUNE FOR TAXPAYERS

Regardless of what March may bring, Michigan has saved thousands of dollars this winter in snow removal by favorable weather conditions. No winter in years has been so favorable to the extensive program inaugurated by the state to keep trunk line highways open to motor traffic.

The state has kept 5704 miles of trunk line highways open—4751 in the lower peninsula and 935 miles in the upper peninsula. The average cost originally was estimated at $44 a mile. But while no definite figures can be obtained, officials estimate that, owing to the favorable weather conditions and the absence of heavy snow, the cost will not exceed $20 a mile. This will save the state $13 ,806 of the estimated cost of $250,976.

But this represents only a small portion of the savings, as larger cities of Michigan also have saved thousands.

January and February are considered the big months in the snow removal fight in Michigan. Yet only one heavy snow fall was recorded in the two months, and that came in January. This fall came quickly and was quickly removed, as it was not necessary to continue operations for long, as would have been the case had the storm continued for days.

February, usually a severe winter month, has not lived up to its snowfall and blizzard reputation. In fact, most trunk line pavements were as bare as during the summer.

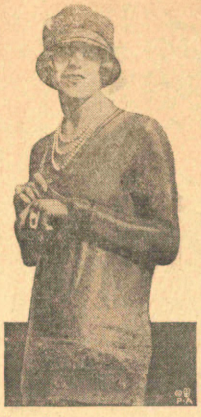
A GOLD "SHIRT" OF "MAIL" —IS PARIS LATEST!



From Paris comes another innovation—a golden "shirt" of mail. Miss Mabel Bell, New York society girl, astounded her friends recently when she appeared in the startling garment shown on her pictured above.

Woven of the finest mesh gold, similar to that used in making purses, the blouse is trimmed with a design in platinum and is an exact replica of the coat worn by knights of the Middle Ages. It need never be washed—merely rubbed with chamois.

INELIGIBILITY HITS ANN ARBOR TEAMS

Michigan's mid year ineligibility reports, at first believed trivial, have developed into severe handicaps toward conference championship honors, particularly in base ball and track. Wrestling suffers but little, hockey almost none at all, but basket ball has sustained a greater los than was at first thought, in view of the insufficiency of capable substitutes that has become apparent in the last three games.

Base ball will lose severely in the absence of Tess Edgar, brilliant catcher and hitter, and Eddie Lange, the best out fielder on last year's varsity. Edgar's loss will, in some measure, be compensated by the substitution of "Red" Davis, diminuitive substitute of last season, but Edgar's timely hitting will be sorely missed as Davis does not compare with last year's regular in that department.

Vic Laschinsky, conference 220-yard dash champion, and one of the country's best, is Coach Steve Farrell's worst ineligibility blow in some time. Vic was being counted on bringing many points to the Wolverines in the 100 as well as the 220, his performances of last spring stamping him as one of Coach Farrell's most reliable point getters.

Two Kellys, one John and the other Louis, have been lost to the cinder path squad through ineligibility to meet scholastic requirements. John, or as he was better known, "Jack," was only a sophomore, but his excellent 440-yard dash runs as a freshman prophesied a successful year for him in 1927. Louis, better known as "Bud," was Coach Farrell's best high jumping prospect, and he was just rounding into shape when the scholastic axe, wielded by his professors, put

The loss of Barley and Molenda in

basketball, and Molenda in base ball as a consequence, is more of a blow than anyone is willing to admit. "Bo" was a wizard at tossing in pot shots from underneath the basket, and undoubtedly would have ben a regular member of the carsity had he reported for practice sooner. Barley was another crack forward, and just about the best substitute to which Coach Mather had access.

For the second successive year, Molenda was being primed to assume a pitcher's berth on the varsity base ball nine, and for the second consecutive year inteligibility has prevented him from participating. "Bo" played amateur base ball last summer and displayed some excellent heaving, but his services in this connection will be lost to the Wolverine nne at least untl the sprng of 1928.

THE EPICURE EATS PINEAPPLE

EPICURUS, the Greek philosopher, maintained that pleasure is the chief good.

No one seems to have recorded whether Epicurus found his food pleasure in ham or eggs, or quail on toast, but we have all known epicures. They tell us not of castles they saw in Spain but of Spanish sauces they ate there; not of the Alps they scaled in Italy, but of Italian spaghetti. To the epicure, Georgia is a place to eat corn bread, Boston a place to eat beans.

If it is a cold blustery day in a northern clime, the epicure who delights in physical comfort wants to be suddenly transported to the tropics. His food must have tropical flavor. The crisp cold air has bestowed on him a hearty appetite; he is hungry, but his food must have the flavor he craves.

Out of the magic of the epicure's kitchen, the chef produces a baked ham. Not an ordinary baked ham, but a savory entrèe baked with delicious Hawaiian pineapple. Slices of the golden fruit garnish the platter; sweet potatoes lay alongside of it, baked with brown sugar and butter syrup which encrusts the ham; and the native fragrance of pineapple, combined with the sweet odor of real Virginia ham, makes this a dish which Epicurus himself would have found a pleasure and therefore a great good.

The epicure will take his pineapple in canned form, as he knows that all the golden, sun-ripened fruit of the Hawaiian plantations are packed into cans and shipped across the ocean to us as fresh as the day they were gathered from the fields. His palate demands this perfection of flavor rather than the taste of a fruit which has been picked green and allowed to ripen in the dark holds of ships.

The instinct of the epicure does not lead him far wrong in the choice of foods, for a food which flavors and makes a meal more palatable, usually helps digest it. Aside from being palatable with meat, pineapple makes meat more easily digested.

Pineapple contains an enzyme, bromelin, which is part of the digestive juice and which not only makes it a very digestible food in itself but helps digest other foods. Besides this, the natural sugar of the fruit is converted into energy twenty minutes after it enters the stomach. Pineapple also contains mineral salts which tone one's system and vitamins which make for growth.

This delight in tropical flavor has made pineapple a favorite not only with the epicure but with all types of people. With vegetables, in fruit cups, in salads and desserts, as well as with meats, has pineapple become popular, since it has been discovered that not only is the flavor of pineapple itself very pleasing, but it brings out the pleasing flavor of foods with which it is served.

Capital punishment proposals in the Legislature have all gone aft agley apparently owing to the efforts of one Jansnowsky an ex-lawyer on the committee and will never become a law. MY NEPHEW JOSEPH

By LUDOVIC HALEVY

(Scene passes at Versailles; two old gentlemen are conversing, seated on a bench in the King's garden.)

Journalism, my dear Monsieur, is the evil of the times. I tell you what, if I had a son, I would hesitate a long while before giving him a literary education. I would have him learn chemistry, mathematics, fencing, cosmography, swimming, drawing, but not composition—no, not composition. Then, at least, he would be prevented from becoming a journalist. It is so easy, so tempting. They take pen and paper and write, it doesn't matter what, apropos to it doesn't matter what, and you have a newspaper article. In order to become a watchmaker, a lawyer, an upholsterer, in short, all the liberal arts, study, application, and a special kind of knowledge are necessary; but nothing like that is required for a journalist."

"You are perfectly right, my dear Monsieur, the profession of journalism should be restricted by examinations, the issuing of warrants, the granting of licenses——"

"And they could pay well for their licenses, these gentlemen. Do you know that journalism is become very profitable? There are some young men in it who, all at onse, without a fixed salary, and no capital whatever, make from ten, twenty to thirty thousand francs a year."

"Now, that is strange! But how do they become journalists?"

"Ah! It appears they generally commence by being reporters. Reporters slip in everywhere, in official gatherings, and theaters, never missing a first night, nor a fire, nor a great ball, nor a murder."

"How well acquainted you are with all this!"

"Yes, very well acquainted. Ah! Mon Dieu! You are my friend, you will keep my secret, and if you will not repeat this in Versailles—I will tell you how it is—we have one in the family."

"One what?"

"A reporter."

"A reporter in your family, which always seemed so united! How can that be?"

"One can almost say that the devil was at the bottom of it. You know my nephew Joseph——"

"Little Joseph! Is he a reporter?"

"Yes."

"Little Joseph, I can see him in the park now, rolling a hoop bare legged, with a broad white collar, not more than six or seven years ago—and now he writes for newspapers!"

"Yes, newspapers! You know my brother keeps a pharmacy in the Rue Montorgueil, an old and reliable firm, and naturally my brother said to himself, 'After me, my son.' Joseph worked hard at chemistry, followed the course of study, and had already passed an examination. The boy was steady and industrious, and had a taste for the business. On Sundays for recreation he made tinctures, prepared prescriptions, pasted the labels and rolled pills. When, as misfortune would have it, a murder was committed about twenty feet from my brother's pharmacy——"

"The murder of the Rue Montorgueil—that clerk who killed his sweetheart, a little brewery maid?"

"The very same. Joseph was attracted by the cries, saw the murderer arrested, and after the police were gone stayed there in the street, talking and jabbering. The Saturday before, Joseph had a game of billiards with the murderer."

"With the murderer!"

"Oh! accidentally—he knew him by sight, went to the same cafe, that's all, and they had played at pool together, Joseph and the murderer—a man named Nicot. Joseph told this to the crowd and you may well imagine how important that hame him, when suddenly a little blond man seized him. 'You know the murderer?' 'A little, not much; I played pool with him.' 'And do you know the motive of the crime?' 'It was love, Monsieur, love; Nicot had met a girl, named Eugenie——' 'You knew the victim, too?' 'Only by sight, she was there in the cafe the night we played.' 'Very well; but don't tell that to anybody; come, come quick.' He took possession of Joseph and made him get into a cab, which went rolling off at great speed down the Boulevard des Italiens. Ten minutes after, Joseph found himself in a hall where there was a big table, around which five or six young men were writing. 'Here is a fine sensation,' said the little blond on entering. 'The best kind of a murder! a murder for love, in the Rue Montorgieil, and I have here the murder's most intimate friend.' 'No, not at all,' cried Joseph, 'I scarcely know him.' 'Be still,' whispered the little blond to Joseph; then he continued, 'Yes, his most intimate friend. They were brought up together, and a quarter of an hour before the crime was committed were playing billiards. The murderer won, he was perfectly calm——' 'That not it, it was last Saturday that I played with——' 'Be still, will you. A quarter of an hour, it is more to the point. Let's go. Come , come.' He took Joseph into a small room where they were alone, and said to him: 'That affair ought to make about a hundred lines—you talk—I'll write—there will be twenty francs for you.' 'Twent francs!' 'Yes, and here they are in advance; but be quick, to business" Joseph told all he knew to the gentleman—how an old and retired Colonel, who lived in the house where the murder was committed, was the first to hear the victim's cries; but he was paralyzed in both limbs this old Colonel, and could only ring for the servant, an old cuirassier, who arrested the assassin. In short, with all the information concerning the game of billiards, Eugenie and the paralytis old Colonel, the man composed his little article, and sent Joseph away with twenty francs. Do you think it ended there?"

"I don't think anything—I am amazed! Little Joseph a reporter."

"Hardly had Joseph stepped outside, when another man seized him—a tall, dark fellow. 'I've meen watching for you,' he said to oJseph. 'You were present when the murder was committed in the Rune Montorgueil!' 'Why, no, I was not present——' 'That will do. I am well informed, come.' 'Where to?' 'To my newspaper office.' 'What for?' 'To tell me about the murder.' 'But I've already told all I know, there, in that house.' 'Come, you will still remember a few more little incidents—and I will give you twenty francs.' 'Twenty francs!' 'Come, come.' Another hall, another table, more young men writing, and again Joseph was interrogated. He recommenced the history of the old Colonel. 'Is that what you told them down there?' inquired the tall, dark man of Joseph. 'Yes, Monsieur.' 'That needs some revision, then.' And the tall dark man made up a long story, how this old Colonel had been paralyzed for fourteen years, but on hearing the victim's heart rending screams, received such a shock that all at onse, as if by a miracle, had recovered the use of his legs; and it was he who had started out in pursuit of the murderer and had him arrested.

"While dashing this off with one stroke of his pen, the man exclaimed: 'Good! this is perfect! a hundred times better than the other account.' 'Yes,' said Joseph, 'but it is not true.' 'Not true for you, because you are acquainted with the affair; but for our hundred thousand readers, who do not know about it, it will be true enough. They were not there, those hundred thousand readers. What do they want? A striking account—well; they shall have it!' And thereupon he discharged Joseph, who went home with his forty francs, and who naturally did not boast of his escapade. It is only of late that he has acknowledged it. However, from that day oJseph has shown less interest in the pharmacy. He bought a number of penny papers, and shut himself up in his room to write—no one knows what. At last he wrote a business loke aspect, which was very funny. About six months ago I went to Paris to collect the dividends on my Northern stock——"

"Oh, it's good stock. Well, I had collected my dividends and had left the Northern Railway station. It was beautiful weather, so I walked slowly down the Rue Lafayette. (I have a habit of strolling a little in Paris after I have collected by dividends.) When at the corner of the Faubourg Montmartre, whom should I see but my nephew Joseph, all alone in a victoria, playing the fine gentleman. I saw very well that he turned his head away, the vagabond! But I overtook the carriage and stopped the driver. 'What are you doing there?' 'A little drive, uncle.' 'Wait, I will go with you,' and in I climbed. 'Hurry up,' said the driver, 'or I'll lose the trail.' 'What trail?' 'Why, the two cabs we are following.' The man drove at a furious rate, and I asked Joseph why he was there in that victoria, following two cabs. 'Mon Dieu, uncle,' he replied, 'there was a foreigner, a Spaniard, who came to our place in the Rue Montorgieil and bought a large amount of drugs, and has not paid us, so I am going after him to find out if he has not given us a wrong address.' 'And that Spaniard is in both the cabs?' 'No, uncle, he is only in one, the first.' 'And who is in the second?' 'I don't know, probably another creditor, like myself, in pursuit of the Spaniard.' 'Well, I am going to stay with you; I have two hours to myself before the train leaves at five o'clock and I adore this sort of thing, riding around Paris in an open carriage. Let's follow the Spaniard!' And then the chase commenced, down the boulevards, across the squares, through the streets, the three drivers cracking their whips and urging their horses on. This man hunt began to get exciting. It recalled to my mind the romances in the Petit Journal. Finally, in a little street, belonging to the Temple Quarter, the first cab stopped."

The Spaniard?"

"Yes. A man got out of it—he had a large hat drawn down over his eyes and a big muffler wrapped about his neck. Presently three gentlemen, who had jumped from the second cab rushed upon that man. I wanted to do the same, but Joseph tried to prevent me. 'Don't stir, uncle!' 'Why not? But they are going to deprive us of the Sapniard!' And I dashed forward. 'Take care, uncle, don't be mixed up in that affair.' But I was already gone. When I arrived they were putting the handcuffs on the Spaniard. I broke through the crowd which had collected, and cried, 'Wait, Messieure, wait; I also demand a settlement with this man.' They made way for me. 'You know this man?' aswed one of the gentlemen from the second cab, a short, stout fellow. 'Perfectly; he is a Spaniard.' 'I a Sapnard!' 'Yes, a Sapniard.' 'Good,' said the short, stout man, 'Here's the witness!' and, addressing himself to one of the men, 'Take Monsieur to the Prefecture immediately.' 'But I have not the time; I live in Versailles; my wife expects me by the five o'clock train, and we have company to dinner, and I must take home a pie. I will come back tomorrow at any hour you wish.' No remarks,' said the short, stout man, 'but be off; I am the Police Commissioner.' 'But, Monsieur the Commissioner, I know nothing about it; it is my nephew Joseph who will tell you,' and I called 'Joseph, Joseph!' out on Joseph came."

"He had decamped?"

"With the victoria. They packed me in one of the two cabs with the detective, a charming man and very distinguished. Arriving at the Prefecture, they deposited me in a small apartment filled with vagabonds, criminals, and low, ignorant people. An hour after they came for me in order to bring me upfo r examination."

"You were brought up for examination?"

"Yes, my dear Monsieur, I was. A policeman conducted me through the Palais de Justice, before the magistrate, a lean man, who asked me my name and address. I replied that I lived in Versailles, and that I had company to dinner; he interrupted me, 'You know the prisoner?' pointing to the man with the muffler, 'Speak up.' But he questioned me so threateningly that I became disconcerted, for I felt that he was passing judgment upon me. Then in my embarrassment the words did not come quickly. I finished, moreover, by telling him that I knew the man without knowing him; then he became furious: 'What's that you say? You know a man without knowin ghim! At least explain yourself!' I was all of a tremble, and said that I knew he was a Spaniard, but the man replied that he was not a Spaniard. 'Well, well,' said the judge. 'Denial, always denial; it is your way.' 'I tell you that m name is Rigaud, and that I was born in Josey, in Josas; they are not Spaniards that are born in Josey, in Posas.' 'Alwaye contradiction; very good, ver good!' And the judge addressed himself to me. 'Then this man is a Spaniard?' 'Yes, Monsieur the Jadge, so I have been told.' 'Do ou know anything more about him?' 'I know he made purchases at my brother's pharmacy in the Rue Montorgieil.' 'At a pharmacy! and he bought, did he not, some chlorate of potash, azotite of potash, and sulphur powder; in a word, materials to manufacture explosives.' 'I don't know what he bought. I only know that he did not pay, that's all.' "Parbleau! Anarchists never pay——' 'I did not need to pay. I never bought chlorate of potash in the Rue Montorgueil,' cried the man; but the judge exclaimed, louder still, 'Yes, it is your audacious habit of lying, but I will sift this matter to the bottom; sift it, you you understand. And now why is that muffler on in the month of May?' 'I have a cold," replied the other. 'Haven't I the right to have a cold?' 'That is ver suspicious, very suspicious. I am going to send for the druggist in the Rue Montorgueil!' "

"Then they sent for your brother?"

"Yes; I wanted to leave, tried to explain to the judge that my wife was expecting me in Versailles, that I had already missed the five o'clock train, that I had company to dinner, and must bring home a pie. 'You shall not go," replied the judge, 'and cease to annoy me with your dinner and your pie; I will need you for a second examination. The affair is of the gravest sort.' 'I tried to resist, but the led me away somewhat roughly, and thrust me again into the little apartment with the criminals. After awiting an hour I was brought up for another examination. My brother was there. But we could not exchange two words, for he entered the court room by one door and I by another. All this was arranged perfectly. The man with the muffler was again brot out. The judge addressed my brother. Do you recognize the prisoner?' 'No.' 'Ah, you see he does not know me!' Be silent!' said the judge, and he continued talking excitedly: 'You know the man?' 'Certainly not.' 'Think well; you ought to know him.' 'I tell you, no.' 'I tell you yes, and that he bought some chlorate of potash from you.' 'No.' 'Ah!' cried the judge in a passion. 'Take care, weigh well your words; you are treading on dangerous ground.' 'I!" exclaimed my brother. 'Yes, for there is your brother; you recognize him, I think.' 'Yes, I recognize him.' 'That is fortunate. Well, your brother there says that man owes you money for having bought at your establishment—I specify—materials to manufacture explisives.' 'But you did not say that.' 'No, I wish to re-establish the facts.' But that judge would give no one a chance to speak. 'Don't interrupt me. Who is conducting this examination, you or I?' 'You, Monsieur the judge?' 'Well, at all events, you said the prisoned owed your brother some money.' 'That I acknowledge.' 'But who told you all them?' asked my brother. 'Your son, Joseph!' 'Joseph!' 'He followed the man for the sake of the money, which he owed you for the drgs.' 'I understand nothing of all this,' said my brother; 'Neither do I,' said the man with the muffler; 'Neither do I,' I repeated in my turn; 'Neither do I any more,' sried the judge; 'Or rather, yes, there is something that I understand very well; we have captured a gang, all these men understand one another, and side with one another; they are a band of Anarchists!' 'That is putting it too strong,' I protested to the judge, 'I, a land owner, an Anarchist! Can a man be an Anarchist when he owns a house on the Boulevard de la Reine at Versailles and a cottage at Houlgate, Calvados? These are facts.' "

"That was well answered."

"But this judge would not listen to anything. He sair to my brother, 'Where does your son live?' 'With me in the Rue Montorgueil.' 'Well, he must be sent for; and in the meanwhile, these two brothers are to be placed in separate sells.' Then, losing patience, I cried that this was infamy. But I felt myself seized and dragged through the corridors and locked in a little box four feet square. In there I passed three hours."

"Didn't they find your nephew Joseph?"

"No, it was not that. It was the judge. He went off to his dinner, and took his time about it! Finally, at midnight, they had another examination. Behold all four of us before the judge. The man with the muffler, myself, my brother and Joseph. The judge began, addressing my nephew: 'This man is indeed your father?' 'Yes.' 'This man is indeed your uncle?' 'Yes.' 'And that man is indeed a Spaniard who purchased some chlorate of potash from you?' 'No.' 'What! No?' 'There,' exclaimed the fellow with the muffler. 'You can see now that these men do not know me.' 'Yes, yes," answered the judge, not at all disconcerted. 'Denial again! Let's see, young man, did you not say to your uncle——' 'Yes, Monsieur the judge, that is true.' 'Ah, the truth! Here is the truth!' exclaimed the judge triumphantly. 'Yes, I told my uncle that the man purchased drugs from us, but that is not so.' 'Why isn't it?' 'Wait, I will tell you. Unknown to my family, I am a journalist.' 'A journalist! My son a journalist! Do not believe that, Monsieur the judge, my son is an apprentice in a pharmacy.' 'Yes, my nephew is an apprentice in a pharmacy,' I echoed. 'These men contradict themselves; this a a gang, decidedly a gang—are you a journalist, young man, or an apprentice in a pharmacy?' 'I am both.' 'That is a lie!' cried my brother, now thoroughly angry. 'And for what newspaper do you write?' 'For no paper at all,' replie my brother, 'I know that, for he is not capable.' 'I do not exactly write, Monsieur the judge; I procure information; I am a reporter.' 'Reporter! My son a reporter? What's that he says?' 'Will you be still!' cried the judge. 'For what newspaper are you a reporter?' Joseph told the name of the paper. 'Well,' resumed the judge, 'we must send for the chief editor immediately—immediately, he must be awakened and brought here. I will pass the night at court. I've discovered a great conspiracy. Lead these men away and keep them apart.' The judge beamed, for he already saw himself Court Counsellor. They brought us back, and I assure you I no longer knew where I was. I came and went up and down the stair cases and through the corridors. If anyone had asked me at the time if I were an accomplice of Ravachol, I would have answered, 'Probably.' "

"When did all this take place?"

"One o'clock in the morning; and the fourth examination did not take place until two. But, thank heaven! in five minutes it was all made clear. The editor of the newspaper arrived, and burst into a hearty laugh when he learned of the condition of affairs; and this is what he told the judge. My nephew had given them the particulars of a murder, and had been recompensed for it, and then the young man had acquired a state for that occupation, and had come to apply for the situation. They had found him clearheaded, bold, and intelligent, and had sent him to take notes at the executions, at fires, etc. and the morning after the editor had a good idea. 'The detectives were on the lookout for Anarchists, so I sent my reporters on the heels of each detective, and in this way I would be the first to hear of all the arrests. Now, you see, it all explains itself; the detective followed an anarchist.' "

"And you nephew Joseph followed the detective?"

"Yes, but he dared not tell the truth, so he told me he was one of papa's debtors.' The man with muffler was triumphant. 'Am I still a Spaniard?' 'No, well and good,' replied the judge. 'But an Anarchist is another thing.' 'And in truth he was; but he only held one, that judge, and was so vexed because he believed he had caught a whole gang, and was obliged to discharge us at four o'clock in the morning. I had to take a carriage to return to Versailles—got one for thirty francs. But found my poor wife in such a state!"

"And your nephew still clings to journalism?"

"Yes, and makes money for nothing but to ride about Paris that way in a cab, and to the country in the railway trains. The newspaper men are satisfied with him."

"What does your brother say to all this?"

"He began by turning him out of doors. But when he knew that some months he hade two or thre hundred francs, he softened; and then Joseph is as cute as a monkey. You know my brother invented a cough lozenge, 'Dervishes' lozenges'?"

"Yes, you gave me a box of them."

"Ah, so I did. Well, Joseph found means to introduce into the account of a murderer's arrest an advertisement of his father's lozenges."

"How did he do it?"

"He told how the murderer was hidden in a panel, and that he could not be found. But having the influenza, had sneezed, and that had been the means of his capture. And Joself added that this would not have happened to him had he taken the Dervishes Lozenges. You see that pleased my brother so much that he forgave him. Ah! there is my wife coming to look for me. Not a word of all this! It is not necessary to repeat that there is a reporter in the family, and there is another reason for not telling it. When I want to sell off to the people of Versailles, I go and find Joseph and tell him of my little plan. He arranges everything for me as it should be, puts it in the paper quietly, and they don't know how it comes there!"

THE END

"ME THROW CUSTARD PIES? MAYBE—SOME DAY!"

Here's an unusually fine photographic study of young Charles Spencer Chaplin, Jr.—oldest child of the famous screen comedian. It took vve months of constantly stalking the Beverly Hills estate of Mr. Chaplin before the newspaper camera men were able to get pleasing snaphhot.

INVENTOR NEARLY MEETS DEATH WHEN NOVEL CRAFT BALKS

Schooners, steamers, launches and scows have plied the Detroit river, faring well in summer but not so good in winter. Blanketed in ice with here and there a patch of open water, the river still refused to surrender its winter fastness to Peter Stone of Detroit, who sought to conquer both ice and water in a curious craft of his own invention.

Stone shoved fof on the maiden voyage of his water and ice machine. In an hour he was waving a frantic S. O. S. and was finally rescued by a fire boat, which later sent out a motor boat to tow the machine ashore.

The craft consists of a stream line body mounted high on two strong pontoons with sled runners on the bottom. It mounts an airplane engine and a propeller.

Stone has not yet named the machine. Someone suggested calling it a scooter. Mecause it looks like a huge grass hopper raised on its front legs, someone else suggested the name of "river grass hopper." But the fact that it is unnamed and neither scoots nor hops is nothing to Stone.

"This is only an experimental job," he said, as he wrung a pail of icy wated out of his clothes. The finished machine will travel 90 miles an hour and carry five tons, he declared.

AUTOS SALVAGED FROM SHIP WRECK

The $250,000 cargo of shipwrecked automobiles from the steamer City of Bangor are on their way to a railroad terminal for shipment back to their factory at Detroit. Sixty days of herculanean effort were required to remove the fleet of new passenger cars from the stranded Bangor.

The Bangor went ashore ina winter storm off Keweenaw Point on th night of Nov. 30. There she stuck until covered by a thick coating of ice that protected the new cars from the storm and gradually increased in thickness until the ship became merely a part of the winter scenery. Then started the effort to rescue the shipwrecked motor cars, and drive them through a 12-foot blanket of snow that had covered the district after the stranding. The route is still unopen, but a massave rotary plow is cutting a path at the rate of a mile a day.

Contract for salvaging the cars and taking them to Calumet, 60 miles from the wreck, was taken by a Duluth firm. A highway was cut through forests for four miles to reach a logging road that touched the lake shore several miles from the wreck. The motors were then run over the ice to Lake Superior to the snow road, finally making their way to Copper Haroor.

FREE NECK CLIPS FOR TRAVERSE GIRLS TABOS

Girls will not get their necks clipped free in Traverse City any more, for the barber's union has decreed that there will be nary a snip for less than 10 cents.

The trouble started over a sliding scale that every tonsorial artist was observing with a laxity that suited the occasion.

Henseforth everything that deals with a haircut is to be put in one class at 50 cents, with clippers on the neck at 10 cents. Shops had been charging 50 cents for a haircut, sometimes less for a "trim" and all sorts of prices for a shingle bob.

PHOTOS OF FAMED DOCUMENTS GIVEN TO STATE COLLEGE

Photographs of the last will and testament of George Washington, the check with which the United States purchased Alaska from Russia, an old volume of the Norfolk, Va., city record, and the first Michigan constitution in the library at Michigan State College. The display is attracting wide attention.

The exhibit was loaned to Mrs. Linda Landon, librarian, by the daughter of the late William Berwick, who served for years as manuscript restorer att the Congressional library in Washington, D. C. Various methods of rejuvenating old manuscripts are illustrated, particularly the re-inforcement of weak shets, which is done so skillfully that the layman is unable to detect the difference. Some of the paper which must necessarily be of age-old color to be grafted on the old documents, was brought from England by Berwick.

Probably the wills of George and Martha Washington are of greatest interest in the exhibit. One phatograph shows the will of General Washington in the condition in which it appeared for years at Fairfax Courthouse, Virginia.

MOTOR TOGS FOR TODAY THE THING

Automobile togs of a quarter of a century ago were just as funny as the autos themselves—women looked like deep sea divers when they started out to take the air.

Later they draped themselves with chicon veils until they suggested harem inmates.

Today they are as chic when the motor as when they dine at the Ritz.

Clothes for motoring trips should be very much like those for any sport—simple, practical, comfortable and easy.

Hats must be simple in line, untrimmed or very slightly so, either with the narrow brims worn in town for sport or countr wear. Felt, finely plaited straws of grosgrain ribbon are about the most satisfactory materials.

Frocks must necessarily be of the sport order—the new tweeds make admirable ones because they come in charming colors and are very light in weight. Jersy, knitted materials, and the sport silks are wise selections. The jumper type is good since it is in two parts and adjusts itself easily.

A particularly attractive dress in good taste is one of green tweed mixture, cut in one piece with a wraparound skirt, but simualting the jumper by a wide pleat at the hips. A low waistline is suggested by a cord tie of jade green silk and finished with large tassels.

The most important item is the coat—always a necessity for the motorist. This should be a light or mixed wool that sheds dust easily. A collarf that frames the face becomingly can be manipulated to give real protection when needed.

The coat must be sufficiently ample in the skirt to cover the gown when the wearer is seated. The little straightline coats with no overlapping wrap at closing are smart for street but annoying for motoring.

Most revolutionary is the coat that defies the long established custom of buttoning itself in the front or side front and calmly buttons down the back, presenting a nuited front and giving protection where protection is due the motorist.

Wide pleats at the side reveal the shaded border of the material which also binds the pockets and cugs. The material is warm but light, with no suggestion of heaviness or clumsiness.

A scarf collar of dark cross fox that continues in a long flat [illegible]ole of the material is the distinguis[illegible] feature of another model. This one ties in front. It comes in a grayish tan. It may be worn scarf fashion about the throat, or the ends may be loosely tied to give the effect of a shawl collar.

Another model is of light gray tweed edged with gray foy. The coat is cut so as to afford maximum protection, with material where you need it. It has a diagonal slash to get it out of the way of motor levers.

LAW FEE MOUNT IN 2 YEAR SUIT OVER PAYMENT OF $1.24

A suit for $2,500 damages, born two years ago of a $1.24 debt, was re-pened in the Circuit Court at Detroit by Herman Strehlor, a steam shovel operator. Strehlor names as defendants the General Motors Acceptance Co., and the Siegel-Zeckendorf Buick Co., charging they kept him from obtaining a clear title to an automobile he bought five years ago from the latter concern.

Strehlor declares in his bill of complaint that he borugt the machine on the deferred payment plan and took up all his notes as they fell due with the exception of the last one which he was 10 days late in paying. Because the acceptance company, which held the notes, demanded $1.24 additional interest for the ten days' lapse, Strehlor says, he was refused a certificate of title to the car, although the $1.24 was not listed on the statements he received from the company.

The suit has undergone several adjournments since it was filed in 1924, with attorney fees for all parties concerned meanwhile mounting out of all proportion of the sum which caused it.

SALT PRODUCED IN KENT SINCE 1842

Grand Rapids youngsters of 65 years or 80 ago didn't have to travel to Atlantic City or some other coast resort for a dip into the briny. They had salt water bathing, and plenty of it, right at home.

Present day dads and grandfathers can recall when sufficient salt was pumped from strata and streams in certain sections of the city to make the venture commercially profitable, at least for a time and also to provide bathing of the sea variety.

Records show that salt was produced in Grand Rapids in commercial quantities over a period of several years, mostly before the Civil war and starting about 1842. The first salt well was bored by the state of Michigan, 1838-42, on the bank of Grand river about a mile below the present southwest corner of the city. In the meantime, Lucius Lyon had sunk a well of his own on the east side of the river about 75 feet north of Bridge street, which was the forerunner of several locally owned enterprises of this kind, some of which were abandoned after short periods, while others were continued for a time with indifferent financial success.

Boring of the state well was not without its discouragements. In his report to the legislature Jan. 1, 1839, Dr. Douglas Houghton, state geologist, set forth that there had been expended on the Grand river project $1,766.52, which was in excess of the appropriation. In 1840 another appropriation this time $5,000, was made for the Grand river test.

The state geologist made a contract with Mr. Lyon to sink a well where preliminary work had been started. Lyon went down 300 feet, as far as his contract required. It cost the state $5,000. In a published letter Lyon stated that at the bottom of the state well he found salt water much stronger than in his own shaft at the same depth.

At a later date the state well was sunk to a depth of 473 feet, after which the work was placed in charge of John Ball, and the boring continued to a depth of 700 feet or more, when the well became clogged by the losing of the drill, and that enterprise was ended, the state making no further effort for its continuance.

There was an impression current at the time, undoubtedly without good foundation, an early history of the city recites, that the stopping of the well was intentional and by the procurement of incitement of parties interested in private borings.

Lucius Lyon had considerable faith in his belief that salt could be procured in paying quantities for commercial use. In the fall of 1839 he engaged an experienced Pennsylvania well borer and his two sons to sink a deep shaft. In August, 1841, the well, averaging about three and a half inches in diameter, had been sunk to a depth of 661 fet.

On putting down a copper tube 360 feet, water flowed from it more than one-third saturated with salt, rising to a height of 20 feet above the surface of the ground. Evaporation and boiling works for the reduction of the brine were immediately constructed and the well began turning out salt in the middle of March, 1842.

40 YEARS FIRE CHIEF, STRIKE THREATENED WHEN OUSTER LOOMED

Joseph F. Sartor, Jr., just has completed 40 years' service in the Alma fire department. The last 16 he has been chief of the department, which has made an usually good record recently.

Sartor's service is unique in several ways. "Joe" joined when he was 15 years old, in 1877. The bucket brigade was then the special feature of the department of the small, struggling hamlet of Alma. Later, a power plant was constructed, and a two-wheeled hose cart was bought, which did duty for many years before giving place to the horse-drawn fire wagon. This, in turn, yielded to a fire truck. The department now boasts of two trucks; one a power pumper.

In the earlier years of the department a brother-in-law of Sartor, Charles Fishbeck, was chief, but 16 years ago he left Alma and the members of the department elected Sartor. This election was followed by his appointment by the mayor and confirmation by the city council.

Every year since then it has been practically routine for him to receive the appointment.

One year an administration that was not entirely friendly proposed to depose him. The firemen served notice that they would resign if this were done, and Sartor was appointed. He has continued to serve since then without friction between himself and his men or the city government.

DAYLIGHT EXPERIMENTS ARE MADE AT ANN ARBOR

The phrase "predicting daylight" tells in two words the results of an investigation of natural lighting which has been carried on during the past three years by Porfessor H. H. Higbie of the department of engineering research of the University of Michigan. The work was done for the Detroit Steel Products company, W. C. Randall, chief engineer, assisting.

As a result of these researches—some of the details of which are to be made public shortly in one of the official bulletins issued by the department—a method of predicting daylight from windows has been formulated.

"Until a very few years ago," says the bulletin, "the science of artificial lighting had far outstripped the science of natural lighting, one reason being that the means for producing artificial light were costly and had therefore to be conserved and economized, while natural light was apparently so entirely without cost that here was no necessity for economy in its use."

With the increasing demand for better natural lighting in such structures as modern school buildings and single-story factory buildings in which uniformity of natural lighting has been one of the problems, the necessity for devising a theoretical method of predicting daylight and then making the widest possible practical application of this method became apparent.

MUCK FARMERS HURT BY TOO MUCH DRAINAGE

"Some Michigan muck farmers are badly in need of legislation which will enable them to rectify mistakes in county drainage systems and restore the proper water level which will result in a maximum crop production," says Prof. Paul M. Harmer, specialist in muck soils of the Michigan State college soils department.

"Drainage in some much areas has been conducted by men unfamiliar with the needs of much land. In many instances the water level has been nave suffered. Mint and celery, which require a water level about two feet below the surface, have suffered the most. Onions and general crops require a water level about three feet below the surface."

Ernest L. Hunter, state drain commissioner, is of the opinion that individuals can not legally dam up a drainage ditch to maintain the proper water level.

5 PCT. OF BIBLE WORDS ARE SIMPLE LITTLE "AND"

The word "and" occurs 46,277 times in the Bible, in which a total of 773,746 words are used. These words are made up of 3,566,480 letters and they are grouped into 31,173 verses, 1,189 chapters and 66 books, it is set forth in a communication from Sydney L. Winstanly, 10301 Gratiot avenue, Detroit. The word "Lord" is found 1,855 times. The middle verse of the Bible is the eighth verse of the eighteenth Psalm. The 21st verse of the seventh cvhapter of Ezra contains all the letters of the alphabet except "j." The longest verse is the ninth verse of the eighth chapter of Esther, and the shortest is the 35th verse of the eleventh chapter of St. John. There are no words or names of more than six syllables.

Her Three Youngsters Born on Same Day---A Year Apart!

An unusual co-incidence in birthdays—is the story that goes with the photo. Pictured is Mrs. R. A. Holsenbeck of Los Angeles, Calif. with her three children—william Aaron, Virginia Ruth and the lastest arrival, as yet unnamed. Each of the youngsters was born on November 10th in the years 1924, 1925, 1926.

BIG YEAR FORECAST FOR FISHERMEN DUE TO KINDLY WATER

If nothing happens between now and May 1 to upset the "dope" this year ought to be one of the best stream fishing years in many since past. Why? Because Old Man Winter has been kind to the trout streams.

Another ice, the dread hazard of the smaller streams has been totally lacking thus far. Anchor ice is the slush and snow that crowds down to the bed of the streams, freezes hard, and when the thaw comes, begins moving slowly, scraping out every bit of vegetation that ever grew on the creek bottom. There haven't been any real blizzards this winter, and blizzards are responsible for anchor ice. With the anchor ice scraping the bottom of the streams clean of all vegetation, the food for the fish is all destroyed, and the fry are left to seat either white sand or each other—neither alternative being conducive to a large crop. Food conditions in the streams now are excellent. Of course, there will be spring freshets, but these will do no harm—at least no harm comparable to that of another ice.

There are plenty of trout in the lower streams, but at present there are none in the upper. As soon as the heavy thaw begins the run will come. When trout do reach the upper waters, they will find wonderful conditions. For Old Man Winter has been good.

4 STATE PARKS SOUGHT IN LAND OF HIAWATHA

The department of conservation is planning for the acquisition of four state parks in the so called Hiawatha land of the upper peninsula, that region made famous by Longfellow's Indian masterpiece. This movement is to preserve a share of the original Indian country. Michgian is rich in Indian lore, but no place appeals so strongly as the beautiful region used as a setting for the beautiful poem, Hiawatha. The intention of the department to preserve it in parks will appeal to all.

In years to come, too, it is bound to be an attractive point of interest for tourist visitors to our state.

PLANE EXPANSION ROUTES PLANNED

Airplans service will be inaugurated from London, Ontario, to Toronto and Detroit, within a few months.

Aerial freight service on a daily schedule between Detroit and Buffalo will be started by the Ford Motor Company not later than Jnly 1, William B. Stout, head of the company's airplane division, states in a coincident announcement.

Arrangements with Canada for the planes to cross Ontario have delayed the start of the service, Stout stated. Dispatches from Ottawa stated that permission to fly over Canadian territory had just been granted to the Ford Company. The Dominion air board has included the proviso that only forced landings be made in Canada.

Both commercial freight and express of the Ford Company will make up cargoes for the line.

Stout also maintained that the start of a Buffalo line is the beginning of service contemplated for large eastern coast cities, including Boston and New York. The Buffalo airport will be used as one of the stops en route for through freight to the east.

As a demonstration of the capability of Ford planes for freight and express work, Stout has taken one of the big ships to Boston, carrying a Ford car, for the formal opening of a new Ford plant at Somerville, a Boston suburb.

MILD WINTER IS BOON FOR BOATS

The thrills and hardships of winter navigation on the Great Lakes have been lacking this season and thousands of dollars have been saved by boat lines. The winter has been the most favorable in history for the operation of boats, despite the forecasts of long distance "prophets" that this was to be a severe winter.

The steamer Alabama has not lost a trip between Muskegon, Grand Haven and Chicago since February, 1926. The only delays were at times when the boat must remain in the harbor for a few hours waiting for the wind to abate.

The past winters it has not been unusual for the entire fleet to be fast in the ice fields for several days. It is possible that some difficulty may be encountered yet, but it is not expected. The ice has been breaking up during the last few weeks of mild weather and it is not believed that the floating ice fields of other years will result.

The carferry lines from Grand Haven to Mlwaukee and from Frankfort across the lake have operated without interruption.

FAVORS SAGINAW LIMIT ON STREET DEBT RAISED

Commissioner George Holcomb of the Saginaw council, is considering the advisability of presenting a charter amendment to the voters providing for raising the street improvement bonding limit from one and one-half per cent to two per cent of the city's assessed valuation. PARKDALE IS FIRST MANISTEE VILLAGE TO PROFTI BY LAW

Parkdale, suburb north of Manistee, on M-11, has been made a safer place for its residents at night, and automobile drivers in the heavy traffic on M-11 need not be in constant fear of hitting some pedestrian who may suddenly loom up ahead. This is the result of a new street lighting system recently switched on.

The Parkdale lighting system is the first in Manistee county under the new state law which requires townships to provide unincorporated villages with street lights up to a cost of $600 annually upon petition of the citizens. The suburbs of Oak Hill and Filer City, south of the city, are to be lighted under the same law as soon as the equipment is ready.

FARMERS TO SEE EUROPE'S CO-OPS

Michigan participants in the "co-operative pilgrimage" to Europe next summer will have an opportunity to study the most efficient co-operative systems in the world, and they are expected to bring back ideas that will prove useful in developing the co-operative movement at home.

The pilgrimage, the first of its kind in history, will be under the auspices of the American Farm Bureau Federation. It is expected that 500 or more farmers and farm leaders will participate. Sailing from New York, July 30, the tourists will visit the Island of Jersey, Germany, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, Belgium, England and Scotland, returning to Montreal by Sept. 25.

Opportunity will be given to study at first hand the long term cultivation methods of very old countries; the most efficient co-operative systems in the world, both in production and marketing; great breeding establishments and historic herds; soil building methods that have maintained a high degree of soil fertility and land cultivation for more than 2,000 years; and the European development of rural electrification.

The farmers also will study methods of irrigation in Denmark, large scade drainage in Holland, terracing in the Rhineland, reforestation in Germany, waste land reclamation in Denmark and Germany, slaughtering, meat packing and egg packing in Denmark, and examples of the most highly perfected landscape gardening in the world in England and France.

They will meet and hear the outstanding leaders of the progressive agricultural movements of Europe, as well as high officials of the various governments who are interested in the problems of the farmer.

The pilgrimage, according to officials of the American Farm Bureau Federation, has been arranged to provide a "unique, unusual opportunity to farm people desiring to visit Europe. It will enable them to make the trip in company with congenial companions and under the most advantageous auspices.

BOATS HARBINGER OF SPRING IN 1800

In the early 1800's the first lake steamer which broke the ice skim on the Detroit river, coming from Buffalo, was regarded a harbinger of easier temperatures and the official breaking of winter. Record early arrivals marking mild minters were chronicled with careful interest. One year in which steamers operated every month, that of 1845, was regarded of historical importance.

Record snow falls and sub zero temperatures ushered in the year of 1816 in Michigan. It was recorded that in Detroit ice formed every month during that year. Five years lateh, April 14 to 20, eight inches of snow fell in eastern Michigan.

The winter of 1823-24 was unusually mild, flowers blossoming during December, January and February. Navigation was started January 13 with the arrival of a freighter from Sandusky. The spring, however, brought an upset with 12 inches of snow on May 1, 1824.

"Six weeks of sleighing in February," the extravagant prediction of home made prophets, was almost realized when the thermometer fell below zero virtually every day in February, 1835.

On Jan. 8, 1838, the steamer Robert Fulton arrived from Buffalo to establish one of the earliest beginnings of yearly lake traffic.

Swing out for the senior class will take place Tuesday, May 10, and cap night, when the freshmen burn their "frosh pots," will be held Friday, May 13. The Youthful Criminal

"Youth is the criminal of today," says a student of criminology "and how can youth be expected to obey parental law, when parents disobey constitutional laws?" Consider the lawlessness of many homes; the home of the man of wealth and the woman of fashion, the father asserting his "personal liberty" with liquor on his sideboard and at his table; the mother serving an intoxicant, or apologizing for its absence, ignoring the law of her country which forbids its use—these are not the types of homes that inspire true patriotism and love of country in the minds of the young.

Consider the home of the foreign father or mother not yet accustomed to the laws or language of their adopted country. The children rule the home, for they have learned the language in the public schools. The parents have no control over their children, no respect for the law. It is a common thing to find stills and contraband liquor in the homes of foreign born citizens, and their children pass from the juvenile court and reformatories to greater crimes which lead to the penitentiary, or worse. Here is a continual economic and spiritual loss to the city, state and nation.

In the words of a noted judge, "The trouble with this country is, it is losing its touch with God. We sing about 'Faith of our Fathers,' and what we need is a return to the faith and prayers of our mothers. The root of the entire question centers in the home." We must so reconstruct the American home that it shall be ever a safe harbor from which the children go forth into the world safeguarded and armed with the faith, prayers and principles that Christian parents can not fail to give. God speed the day when the homes of our country shall indeed fulfill their highest and holiest mission. Then shall we cease to hear so much of the "youthful criminal."
—Minnie Barker Horning.

The End

Game Restrictions

Nimrods, who kill all the game that the state of Michigan allows them to under the law and then jump to Wisconsin or Minnesota during a later season and kill more. are in for a bad time of it if plans of leading conservationists carry through at the Out-Door Life Conference in Chicago May 9 to 14.

Governor Fred W. Green has been invited to lead the Michigan delegatian of conservationists who will take part in the conference and the governors of Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa and Wisconsin have signified their intentions of being on hand to help formulate plans for a unification of game laws for the states they represent.

Governor Fred Zimmerman of Wisconsin took the lead in plans for the Conference recently when he invited the governors to join him there after he investigated the condition of the natural resources of his state, In Wisconsin, it was learned, more than $100,000,000 is being spent each year by tourists whose primary interest in touring the state is to enjoy its natural resources. This tremendous revenue will drop off sharply, Governor Zimmerman believes, unless steps are taken to preserve that for which the tourist visits the state. Believing that nearby states must face the same problem as Wisconsin he has invited the governors of those states to help him formulate game and forestry laws that will stop the destruction and waste of what constitutes the greatest assets the states have.

"With the governors of five states to lead the fight, I am confident that we can take real steps in conservation at the Conference.

As Michigan has much the same conservation situation as Wisconsin, Governor Green is expected to lead a large number of Northwoods people from this state who are going to the Conference. Governor Small of Illinois is at present engaged in conservation work.

Michigan too is in danger of losing much of its game life and natural forests and with them a tremendous amount of money brought in by tourists each year.

Signs of The Times]

Alfred P. Sloan, President of the General Motors Corporation of America sends us the following letter relative to advertising automobiles in country weeklies and we think it is very worthy of publication. This is what he says:

"Mr. Louis V. Harvey, Editor
North Adams Advocate
North Adams, Mich.
Dear Mr. Harvey:

Within a few days you will receive from our advertising agents, Barton, Durston & Osborn, Inc., of New York, an order for the first of a series of advertisements of approximately two full columns, which we plan to publish during the next three months.

This represents a two-fold departure in our advertising policy: 1. For the first time we are advertising all of the General Motors cars together, (Chevrolet, Pontiac, Oldsmobile, Oakland, Buick, Cadillac) also, Delco Light plants and Frigidaire, the Electric Refrigerator, and we are attaching a coupon for the purpose of bringing direct inquiries from prospective buyers.

2. For the first time we are going into the country weeklies, spending on this trial campaign alone several hundred thousand dollars.

The plan of this campaign originated in my own office. I believe in the country weekly. I believe that no printed matter in the United States is more thoroughly read, or has more influence than the pages of these home town papers. I believe it is not too much to hope that these advertisements in your columns may discover for us twenty, or thirty or even fifty prospects to whom we can send fuller information about one or another of our cars. If this proves to be the case, I hope that a campaign of this character can become a permanent annual part of our advertising program.

I know that you are interested in every new development of advertising in your paper and I shall be personally appreciative of anything that you, or your associates, can do to make this experiment a real success.

Very truly yours,
Alfred P. Sloan"

BUY YOUR SUNSHINE BY THE CAN

BUYING "climate" has been a popular pastime of millionaires who build a villa here and a Spanish mansion there, so that they may have the benefit of the very best which can be bought in climate.

Purchasing canned sunshine and air in the form of a can of Hawaiian pineapple is a less expensive pastime which the housewife can enjoy for a quarter.

Botanically, the pineapple belongs to a very peculiar family of "air plants." The Spanish moss that drapes trees in the Southern regions of Florida and Louisiana, is an air plant, and a species of pineapple—so are orchids and vanilla. But the pineapple, particularly absorbs and thrives on air. Growers say that a pineapple plant may be pulled from the field, thrown on a dry macadam road and will live for weeks since most of its nourishment comes from the air.

Anyone, then who has breathed the air of the Paradise Islands the fresh warm air, salt laden, that is wafted over the Pacific by trade winds and warmed by the tropical sun, can understand something of the health-giving properties which go to make up the pineapple. Plantation owners realized this fact, during the early history of the pineapple plantations. They looked at the big golden fruits ripening in the fields, and then at greener fruits which were the only ones which could be safely shipped. Pineapple cannot be shipped ripe as it bruises too easily. So all the pineapple which reached the housewife at that time, had to be ripened in the holds of shipping vessels. Most of the natural fruit sugar was lost, as the pineapple is an air plant, and cannot ripen properly without sun and air.

And then was born the thought of the canned pineapple. The fruit could be allowed to ripen in the field, thus imprisoning all its natural fruit sugar. Then at its splendid maturity, it could be preserved for the housewife's use!

"Once the pineapple are in cans, there is the whole world for a market" they began to say. And they kept on saying it, until the dream of a world-wide use of canned pineapple began to approach fulfillment.

Today, pineapples are shipped in cans to every part of the world, because the facilities for handling the fruit at high speed, have made it possible to literally "can sunshine and air" which has made up the fruit itself.

Directly alongside the two largest canneries in Honolulu is a can-making factory which can turn out 1,000,000 cans a day. As canners use far more than a million a day in the busy season, the can factories work through the entire year, producing cans which will carry the sunshine of Hawaii in the form of luscious canned pineapple to every part of the globe.

Farm Bureau Legislative News

Livestock producers of Michigan Ohio, Indiana, New York and Pennsylvania were denied the right of intervening with the Government in the hearing begun last Thursday at Buffalo, New York by the Packers and Stockyard's Administration of the U. S. Department of Agriculture for investigations of charges made by the U. S. Sec. of Agriculture, alleging that twelve old line commission firms operating on the Buffalo livestock market have been guilty of unfair, deceptive and discriminating practices contrary to law.

The charges are the alleged practice of "weighing up," whereby com. firms are accused, of selling to themselves livestock consigned to them and then reselling it to packers charging both country shippers and packer buyer commissions for what is in effect, but one sale,

The twelve firms cited are Dunning and Stevens Inc.; Ford and Holloway; Imhoff Com. Co.; Maxwell and Son; Meeke, Boren and Miller Inc.; The Daiton Meeks Co.; Saddler, Rerick and Co.; Rice and Whaley; Swohe, Hughes, Watty, and Benstead; Ransom and Mansfield Co.; Stacey Bennent and Beadle. The latter four companies added as second offenders under the act.

The Armstrong-Palmer capitol punishment bill is still being held in the Senate committee of Judiciary which threatens a legislative deadlock unless senate action is soon taken.

From an agricultural point of view, probably the most important action taken during the past week was the passage by the House of Senator Horton's Corn Borer Bill. This measure gives the State Department of Agriculture full authority to establish quarantines and enforce clean up measures, as passed by the Senate, it provided $200,000 a year state funds for this purpose. The House committee on ways and means cut the amount to $100,000 a year, but the House committee of the whole adopted an amendment offered by Rep. Dennis Clancy of Hillsdale which provides that the State Administrative Board shall have authority to expend not to exceed $100,000 a year additional if in its opinion the emergency demands it.

After being reported favorably by the House committee of the whole Friday morning the rules were suspended and the bill passed 76 to 1 and was given immediate effect. The lone negative ballot was cast by Rep. Virgil A. Fitch of Ludington.

Relative to the Highway finance program sentiment seems to be swinging from a flat $5 permanent license for passenger cars to a sliding scale of permanent licenses for these vehicles. The rate most favored seems to be 40c per cwt. for a license good for the car. The present annual rate is 55c per cwt.

Of course such a plan would also include a 4c gas tax and an annual weight tax on commercial vehicles, but a marked reduction from the present rates in the levy on light trucks.

O. C. Holcomb, Minute Man of Adams Township.

He Thinks Its Too Bad

Below we are quoting what one editor thinks of the vetoing of the recent McNary—Haugen Bill by President Coolidge. This editor is Charles Stengle of the National Farm News published at Washington D. C. one of the most virile farm papers we know of. Mr. Stengle is not bashful in critcising the president and what he says goes right to the quick. Read it as follows:

"It is my judgment now that every man who tills the soil ought to go at once to the next meeting of the nearest farm organization and add his name to those of his neighbors and help to do his part toward rescuing the industry upon which he depends for the livelihood of his family and himself. The time is long since past when we can hope to secure proper recognition for agriculture by each working individually toward that end. We must couple up as one man and then fight for the common weal of all. I am not the agent of any organized society of farmers hence I care not what organization you join but you should for your own good and for the welfare of those whom you love get into an organization of farmers at the earliest possible moment.

If I had the opportunity to sit down with the President for a little while and discuss this great subject of agricultural recognition, I think I would say something like this: "Mr. President, assuming that you are perfectly honest in your decision to veto the bill which the farmers asked Congrsss to pass don't you think that common justice demands that, inasmuch as you acknowledged that there was a real farm problem, you should sit down and write out a bill which you believe will relieve the American farmers of the terrible load which they are now carrying? If you and your advisers know more about what the farmers need than they themselves know, why don't you tell them what you think is best for them. But please, Mr. President, don't again suggest that they need another loan of money for they are already overloaded. All they ask is a fair deal and that much they are surely entitled to."

Road Conditions Are Bad in This Vicinity

There is a feeling of inconvenience in this township and in Moscow on account of the "soft" spots in our high class expensive gravel roads. These roads have cost the tax-payers a tremendous sum of money and to see them deteriorate as they are this spring seems like a sacrifice. Whether the trouble is caused by poor workmanship, unsufficient drainage or rotten gravel spread too thin on the surface nobody is just positive but we do know that for the price which we bid for the roads some sort of durablity ought to be guaranteed. This week we understand both the gravel roads north and south-east of the village are broken through and practically impassable for even light passenger cars. On Saturday Bert Trumbull driving the County road grader suddenly found his machine dropping down on the highway near the Westfall farm. The result was a complete tie-up for some hours. It required considereble work to get out. Everywhere on these two supposedly good roads cars are being mired. Some are inclined to believe the mild winter is largely responsible for the conditions. With so little frost in the ground the moisture has peuetrated to great depths and thoroughly saturated the road bed hence the "Soft Spots". With this record of expensive road maintainance it is doubtful if the tax-payers will ever arrive at a basis where they can say the burden has been removed.

Listen in on Saturday evenings for WLS Chicago. Here you will find one of the best programs over the air for Michigan folks with little or no interference. Who has not heard the genial "Chubby Parker" sing "The Contraband" or "Stay in Your Own Back Yard" and how do you like Tetro Guidotta the Italian boy with an accordian big as a piano or The double barreled Kentucky Wonder Bean Walter Peterson with his harmonica and guitar rendering of the lively airs of by-gone days. Ralph Waldo Emerson with Elsie May Look at the big studio organ in Hotel Sherman Studio, or Tommy Danderand and his gang in the barn dances. Seems as if the old time dance had come back to stay, as you listen in on these stirring melodies, We are not advertising broadcasting particularly but in the interest of our readers we recommend these stations. If you turn to WREO you will hear the "Good will Ensemble" Gene Goldkett's Recording Orchestra, and at WLW you get the Southern Serenaders.

Broadcasting Church Services

Under all circumstances the new method of broadcasting church services is certainly a winner. Several of the churches of both Chicago, Detroit and smaller cities are paying for this work at the rate of two dollars a minute and they feel the proposition is a paying one at that. We predict the work will continue to increase with the years and the day is not far distant when a mirror in the front panel of your radio will show you the actual scene of the room and the speakers as they are. It is going to be possible to not only send the spoken word sailng through ethereal spaces but the picture also will appear as a movie right in front of your face. One of the most mysterious things of material life is the science of handling the electric current of which we know practically nothing. That is—we use it every day in a hundred ways yet we know nothing of its origin and no man knows exactly what it is. To think of an unseen fire which scroches with a tremendous heat far stronger than artificial heat, shoots through the air for hundreds of miles with no conductor, leaves no ash or cinder nor any known gas after it disappears, is little short of miraeulous. Good old Ben Franklin in 1777, one hundred and fifty years ago knew fully as much concerning its origin as we do. He knew he got a shock from his kite string, and that's all we know. Thomas Edison is commonly referred to as the "Wizard" because he has invented numberless ways of utilizing this unseen force but he's in the same class with Old Ben. Both pikers. Yet electricity passes with cheerful promptness through every known substance and is everywhere present. If you dig one thousand feet into the bowels of the earth he is right on the spot waiting for you, if you soar 5,000 feet in the air he laughs in spiteful glee from the cloud of silver lining in short he is as inevitable as death itself, and yet the rascal is harnessed to our most ponderous machinery and he can't get away. He can not escape us anymore than we can lose him. When will some brainy inventor tell us what electricity is and where it comes from.

Speaking of using the electric giant for transmitting through the air, the use of radio alone on the ocean if it never was good for any thing else, would be considered the most valuable discovery of the century. From KDKA, from WLS from WLW he speaks to us regularly and from London he pierces his way across thousands of miles of trackless ocean. Rev. H. H. Savage, pastor of the First Baptist church of Pontiac found he had in his audience last Sunday morning 122 people from twenty miles or more away and one or two who had driven over one hundred miles to hear the sermon. From all parts of Ontario Canada, from Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, New York State, Wisconsin and at times as far east at Massachusetts they listen in on his talks. It is no uncommon thing to receive letters from persons in eastern New York requesting certain songs to be rendered and asking spiritual aid in trouble, so that the preacher feels his time is entirely filled. Rev. Alvin Magary of the Woodward Avenue Presbyterian church Detroit finds great benefits accruing from his broadcasting to the masses. Each Sunday numberless questions have to be answered which are sent in by the invisible audience. Tne Catholic shrine of the Little Flower in Detroit also uses the air each Sabbath Here are sent out the different services many of them in Latin of the Catholic faith and all who will tune in on Sunday afternoon can hear as plainly as if they sat in the church. This is given over WJR Detroit.

Saturday evening is also an interesting time on the air. Quite frequently New York City and Atlantic Beach stations are heard here. WOC at Davenport, Iowa, is prominent, and KDKA comes to us every evening.

Clean Up and Paint Up

Coolidge Put on His Kibosh

Farmers from Mackinaw to Prattville in Michigan have been propaganding to beat the band for several weeks trying to get a measure through Congress which would benefit them financially and finally get action in Congress only to have the whole thing knocked silly by President Coolidge's veto. To say they are disappointed is putting it too mildly—most of them are genuinely mad through and through. Well, it is of course hard to kick against the pricks, but it is not unlikely the President has some very good reasons for doing as he has. His own story is that the bill is contradictory and while it might help a vast majority of tillers of the soil in some sections it might likewise seriously injure others in other sections.

We have never read the McNary—Haugen bill but if it is anything like the bill sponsored by the late Arthur Williams and Senator Capper of Kansas it would sure create a large number of jobs in Washington—and the Lord knows too many of them exist now for the benefit of the agriculturist. The Williams—Capper bill we believe carried with it an immense appropriation of public funds for paying men to manipulate the farmers interests in Washington and if we mistake not the farmers interest has already suffered too much manipulation. President Coolidge says in short that there is only one correct barometer of prices of farm commodities, and that is the demand as co-ordinate with the supply. This alone must tell the story according to his ideas, and in a certain sense there is no other regulator. But when the supply and demand is tinkered with as has been the custom for years by Boards of Trade in Chicago and New York who is going to know where it is at? If the farmers of this nation do not get some kind of relief before the Coolidge administration is ended they will certainly not support him but this probably does not worry the Chief Executive—in fact he appears to us to not care for another try at the Presidential job. As usual the Democrats are tearing up the soil over this veto. This week we received from Ex-Senator Jamieson at Washington a lot of Democrat propaganda written up in that gentleman's catchy style criticising Coolidge from the Jack-ass standpoint. Jamieson chargesthat President Coolidge supports every measure which protects monopoly and vetos every measure calculated to assist the poor down-trodden soil tiller, and he may be in a way telling facts but those facts never will elect a Democratic president.

Deadly Poison Rings

There were two forms of poison rings, those simply affording in the bezel a secret receptacle, so that the poison might always be at service for the purpose of suicide, and those provided with a hollow point to which, on touching the spring, the venom ran as in a snake's fang, so that the murderer could give a fatal scratch while shaking hands.

MATCHED COLORS NOW ARE VOGUE

Time was when the average business girl or housewife whose clothes allowance was limited would find in the shops only dowdy, poorly designed frocks at the figure she could afford to pay. Now, however, many moderately priced garments have as much style and real beauty of line as the expensive models, and the hues are exquisite. The current vogue for carefully matched colors in costume and accessories may be indulged in by any one who has the good taste and the patience to seek until she finds just the nuances of shade that she requires. Jewelry, scarfs, handbags, hosiery, shoes, rubbers and even galoshes may be had to harmonize with any color scheme that milady may find flattering to her type.

The question of dressing to type has been discussed many times before, but it is a subject that seems to be of perennial interest. Every year more women and girls are catching the idea that in order to make the most of their beauty they must be true to their own type and not be satisfied to copy others.

Spring is the time for flowers and delicate floral shades, clear yellows, soft blues and mauve, the tender green of new foliage, clear pinks and peach hues, blue-grays and pink-grays and warm tans.

Almost any healthy girl with a clear skin will find these tints wearable, but in order to bring out the distinctive beauty of her type each should limit her selection to some extent.

Thet tall, slender blond with white or ivory skin should emphasize the pure, lily like quality of her beautq. Strong colors and bouffant lines do not harmonize with her type. She might choose for her spring wardrobe an evening gown of gold metal cloth with wold foot wear, and if her eyes are blue, a necklace and rings of that hue. For anafternoon frock a pale yellow green flat crepe, shading down to dark green for the skirt in the new compose effect would be becoming. For town or school year she might choose a dark green twill or wool persey coat suit and small hat to match. Deep cream or pale yellow may be used for the vest, facing of hat brim, stockings and gloves. Kick plaits and trimming of block shepherd's check on cream make an effective dark note for such an outdoor costume. For variety, floral patterns in green, yellow, rose and lavender may be used in georgette crepe for afternoon wear.

A popular frock with the season's bebutante is a picture mode of black taffeta with prim little tight bodices and full closely gathered skirts faced with color, and with an irregular hem line which allows the contrasting color to be seen. They are very smart when worn by the right person, but fatal if the person is the least bit too heavy or too mature in appearance.

Hail the return of cotton fabrice to favor, but not the cotton fabrics of old—ah, no! Cotton this season does not try to take the place of silk, but instead takes its own place; its own place is very definitely established, and belnogs to the out of doors, or to any place where laundering is an important factor. Wonderful strides have been made towards the durability of silk, but no silk fabric will really ever be as hardy as a cotton.

In the smart cotton fabrics for spring one sees some altogether delightful effects, particularly in the cotton prints. These amusing little prints are usually in very small, and dainty designs, and seem to have a quaint charm that reminds us of Grandmother's day. One such design reproduced little flowers in shades of red, yellow and shades of green on a navy blue ground. Another lovely design featured small old fashioned bouquets in natural colors on a corn colored ground.

Printed French voile, jacquard cotton crepe, rayon decorated organdie, printed batiste, cotton rep, ginghams, madras shirting, printed dimity and hand blocked linen are only a few of the beautiful cottons in new designs colors and weaves that are returning to favor.

Organdy is the cotton sister of taffeta that is never lacking in charm. The new organdies are in colors that would make one almost weep, so delicate are they. And what you think is new! Organdy printed in delightful designs—usually border designs or tiny florals. Ahe you the type to wear a lovely hand made organdy party frock, sa over a matching slip of taffeta, so that the cunning little rose buds will shoy up on the organdy? Such a gown would instantly distinguish you, even in the glitter of beaded and sequinned frocks.

Boil a quantity of lettuce, strain and chop. Chill on ice and marinate with a rich French dressing. Serve in a mold on a lettuce leaf with Russian dressing. This is one of the most healthful of salads.

THE MIRROR

By Catulle Mendes

There was once a kingdom where mirrors were unknown. They had all been broken and reduced to fragments by order of the queen, and if the tiniest bit of looking glass had been found in any house, she would not have hesitated to put all the inmates to death with the most frightful tortures.

Now for the secret of this extraordinary caprice. The queen was dreadfully ugly, and she did not wish to be exposed to the risk of meeting her own image; and, knowing herself to be hideous, it was a consolation to know that other women at least could not se that they were pretty.

You may imagine that the young girls of the country were not at all satisfied. What was the use of being beautiful if you could not admire yourself?

They might have used the brooks and lakes for mirrors; but the queen had foreseen that, and had hidden all of them under closely joined flagstones. Water was drawn from wells so deep that it was impossible to see the liquid surface, and shallow basins must be used instead of buckets, because in the latter there might be reflections.

Such a dismal state of affairs, especially for the pretty coquettes, who were no more rare in this country than in others.

The queen had no more compassion being well content that her subjects should suffer as much annoyance from the lack of a mirror as she felt at the sight of one.

However, in a suburb of the city there lived a young girl called Jacinta, who was a little better off than the rest, thanks to her sweetheart, Valentine. For if someone thinks you are beautiful, and loses no chance to tell you so, he is almost as good as a mirror.

"Tell me the truth," she would say, "what is the color of my eyes?"

"They are like dewy forget me nots."

"And my skin is not quite black?"

'You know that your forehead is whiter than freshly fallen snow, and your cheeks are like blush roses."

"How about my lips?"

"Cherries are pale beside them."

"And my teeth, if you please?"

"Grains of rice are not as white."

'But my ears, should I be ashamed of them?"

"Yes, if you would be ashamed of two little pink shells among your pretty curls."

And so on, endlessly, she delighted, he still more charmed, for his words came from the depth of his heart and she had the pleasure of hearing herself praised, he the delight of seeing her. So their love grew more deep and tender every hour, and the day that he asked her to marry him she blushed certainly, but not with anger. But, unluckily, the news of their happiness reached the wicked queen, whose only pleasure was to torment others, and Jacinta more than anyone else, on account of her beauty.

A little while before the marriage Jacinta was walking in the orchard one evening, when an old crone approached, asking for alms, but suddenly jumped back with a shrieg as if she had stepped on a toad, crying: "Heavens, what do I see?"

"What is the matter, my good woman? What is it you see? Tell me."

"The ugliest creature I ever beheld."

"Ten you are not looking at me," said Jacinta, with innocent vanity.

"Alas! yes, my poor child, it is you. I have been a long time on this earth, but never have I met anyone so hideous as you!"

"What! Am I ugly?"

"A hundred times uglier than I can tell you."

"But my eyes——"

"They are a sort of dirty grey; but that would be nothing if you had not such an outrageous squint."

"My complexion——"

"It looks as if you had rubbed coal dust on your forehead and cheeks."

"My mouth——"

"It is pale and withered, like a faded flower."

"My teeth——"

"If the beauty of teeth is to be large and yellow, I never saw any so beautiful as yours."

"But, at least, my ears——"

"They are so big, so red, and so misshapen, under your coarse elflocks, that they are revoltng. I am not pretty myself, but I should die of shame if mine were like them."

After this last blow, the old witch, having repeated what the queen had taught her, hobbled off, with a harsh croak of laughter, leaving poor Jacinta dissolved in tears, prone on the ground beneath the apple trees.

Nothing could divert her mind from her grief. "I am ugly—I am ugly," she repeated constantly. It was in vain that Valentin assured and reassured her with the most solemn oaths. "Let me alone; you are lying out of pity. I understand it all now; you never loved me; you are only sorry for me. The begger woman had no interest in deceiving me. It is only too true—I am ugly. I do not see how you can endure the sight of me."

To undeceive her, he brought people from far and near; every man declared that Jacinta was created to delight the eyes; even the women said as much though they were less enthusiastic. But the poor child persisted in her conviction that she was a repulsive object, and when Valentin pressed her to name their wedding day—"I, your wife!" cried she. "Never! I love you too dearly to burden you with a being so hideous as I am." You can fancy the despair of the poor fellow so sincerely in love. He threw himself to his knees; he played; he supplicated; she answered still that she was too ugly to marry him.

What was he to do? The only way to give the lie to the old woman and prove the truth to Jacinta was to put a mirror before her. But there was no such thing in the kingdom, and so great was the terror inspired by the queen that no workman dared make one.

"Well, I shall go to court," said the lover in despair. "Harsh as our mistress is, she cannot fail to be moved by the tears and the beauty of Jecinta. She will retract for a few hours at least this cruel edict which has caused our trouble."

It was not without difficulty that he persuaded the young girl to let him take her to the palace. She did not like to show herself, and asked of what use would be a mirror, only to impress her more deeply with her misfortune; but when he ept, her wheart was moved, and she consented, to pleast him.

"What is all this?" said the wicked queen. "Who are these people, and what do they want?"

"Your majesty, you have before you the most unfortunate lover on the face of the earth."

"Do you consider that a good reason for coming here to annoy me?"

"Have pity on me."

"What have I to do with your love affairs?"

"If you would permit a mirror——"

The queen rose to her feet, trembling with rage. "Who dares to speak to me of a mirror?" she said, grinding her teeth.

"Do not be angry, your majesty, I beg of you, and deign to hear me. This young girl whom you see before you, so fresh and pretty, is the vict m of a strange delusion. She imagines that she is ugly."

"Well," said the queen, with a malicious grin, "she is right. I never saw a more hideous object."

Jacinta, at these cruel words, thot she would die of mortification. Doubt was no longer possible, she must be ugly. Her eyes closed, she fell on the steps of the throne in a deadly swoon.

But Valentin was affected very differently. He cried out loudly that her majesty must be mad to tell such a lie. He had no time to say more. The guards seized him, and at a sign from the queen the headsman came forward. He was always beside the throne, for she might need his services at any moment.

WHAT TYPE OF SET IS BEST FOR RURAL DISTRICTS.

The needs of the country man and the city man, as far as radio is concerned, differ to a certain extent. The man who is located in the city is apt to be extremely close to one or more powerful stations. His set needs to be extremely selective so that he can get rid of the programs of the station or stations he does not want to hear and select that which he does. The country dweller, on the other hand, is generally at least twenty miles away from a local broadcasting station. He is also fortunate in being removed from the neighborhood of factories, elevator equipped buildings, street cars, etc., the electric motors of which are a source of radio interference. On the other hand, the city man may have a set which will receive over only a short distance and still get programs.

The country dweller will require a set that is sensitive. In other words, a set which will receive programs from distant stations without difficulty.

Most regenerative sets, if used in the city, will interfere with the programs of neighbors. This applies in particular to single circuit regenerative sets that use no radio frequency. In the country, however, houses are usually far enough apart so that oscillating regenerative sets will not interfere far enough to disturb anyone except the man who owns it.

It is, therefore, possible to make a cheep and ecective country installation. We would recommend that the city man use a set employing tuned radio frequency by all means, or a Super-Heterodyne. Either of these types of sets will give ideal reception in the country as well, but if it is desired to make a less expensive receiver, a three tube, thre circuit regenerative set or even on of the factory made, two tube single circuit regenerative sets, such as are being sold so cheaply at present can be used with very satisfactory results. These little inexpensive sets will often bring in programs from stations over a thousand miles away without difficulty. Your reception, of course, depends to a great extent on the location and and the excellence of the antenna installation. Should you desire loud speaker volume, it is possible to add an extra stage of audio amplivcation to one of these sets very cheaply and easily. For information on this, write to the editor of this newspaper.

Dear Sir:

Can a five tube Freed-Eiseman receiver be changed from the neutrodyne to tuned radio principle without tearing down the set? If so, will you advise me by sending picture diagram Is there some balancing instrument which would be of better service than the sliding tube used in these sets?

S. OVERTON.

Dear Sir:

The Neutrodyne is a form of tuned radio frequency receiver, so I do not see that any changes will be necessary in your Freed-Eiseman set. The sliding tube which you refer to is a neutralizing condenser, and if properly adjusted will be perfectly satisfactory. It may be that your neutralization is out of adjustment. If so, either re-neutralize it yourself or send it back to the dealer from whom you bought it.

Yours very truly,

Dear Sir:

I am a new radio fan, and just bought a four tube Atwater Kent about a month ago. I am not very familiar with the manufacture of radies, so I am coming to you for some odvice.

Why is it that when the local broadcasting station is on the air, it spreads all over my dials?

I am not getting the volume or distance that would be expected from such a set. Can you tell me what is wrong. O am using a 6 V "A" storage battery—two 45 V "B" batteries, and four 201X radiotron tubes. My connections are right, according to the diagram received with the set. I suppore I could get this information locally, but I am not in a position to pay any fee for same. Can you tell me how to increase distance and volume at very little cost. What in your opinion is the best "B" eliminator on the market? Are Are they better than "B" batteries?

Thanking you in anticipation.
JOHN BEVELUDGE.

Dear Sir:

You might me able to make your Atwater Kent more selective by puttinng a .00025 mfd. fixed condenser in the antenna lead. This should sharpen tuning toa considerable degree. It is also possible that you are using too long an aerial. Refer to your instruction book and remember that the term aerial is generally usced to include the lad-in and the ground. I cannot recommend any "B" eliminators as being "best" because there are so many good ones. However, on my own set I use regular "B" batteries, because I have never yet heard of a "B" battery that hummed or a "B" eliminator that didn't.

Very truly yours,
FEDERATED RADIO TRADE SCHOOL.
Director, Extension Division.

Dear Sir:

I have a set consisting of two stages of tuned radio frequency, detector and three stages of transformer coupled audio. I can get 51 stations on the loud speaker at the second stage of audio. Whei I plug in the last stage there is a terrible whistling that I have tried to eliminate and can not.

I also get continued interference from a trolley line which passes my house. I have tried vareious grounds, changed the direction of my aerial and many other things. If you can give me any information on this subject, I shall greatly appreciate it.

Yours very truly,
NEWTON L. WOOD.

Dear Sir:

Sets with three stages of audio frequency amplification should use 2 to 1 ratio transformers. To eliminate the whistle and still have three stages of amplification, you might use resistance coupling for the last two stages instead of the transformers.

In regard to the interference of the trolley cars, you had best communicate with the trolley car company. It may be that they have some defective apparatus. If they are unwilling or unable to do anything in this connection, I believe there is nothing you can do to stop the noise.

Very truly yours,
FEDERATED RADIO TRADE SCHOOL.

SAY VITAMINES IN CANS DISCARDED

Valuable health-giving vitamins and body building minerals are thrown away every time the housewife drains the liquid from canned peas in preparing this vegetable for serving, Dr. Marie Dye, of the home economics department, Michigan State College has discovered in a series of experiments to determine the food value of canned peas.

After making the discovery, Dr. Dye appealed to the commercial canners of the state to assist in educating the public to the value of the liquor and to discourage the wasteful practice of draining it into the sink.

In processing peas, Dr. Dye found that part of the minerals and vitamins in peas become soluable and become a part of the liquor in which they were cooked. These valuable foods are locked in the can when the tin is sealed and are retained in about the same proportion as they are found in green peas fresh from the garden.

BEDFORD WOMAN OF 81 LAYS HEALTH TO WORK

To the housewife who considers parlor, bedroom and bath almost too much to care for, Mrs. Rebecca Jones, Bedford township, 81 years old, hurls the challenge that work—plenty of it—is a tonic and life preserver. She was born in Brechonshire, Eng., and is the mother of eight children, six sons and two daughters, all of whom are living except one son. She does all the housework for herself and a son. In perfect health, she finds time not only for cooking, baking, washing dishes, sweeping and dusting, making beds and so on, but also to raise flowers and vegetables.

POLICEMAN GIVEN RIGHT TO FOLLOW NOSE TO RUM

The Pulver Bill, which gives prohibition enforcement officers the right to search private dwellings under suspicion through the sense of smell, was adopted. An amendment was attached which prevents conviction other than when liquor in the stage of manufacture is found in the building.

FARM GROUPS PLAN TOWN FIRE COMPANIES

Alarmed over the increase in fire insurance rates on farm property farm leaders in the state are investigating the possibilities of organizing township fire companies. The law is being studied to determine whether the cost of equipment can be spread upon the tax roll by vote of property owners.

The plan, as contemplated in some townships, is to establish a fire station at some central point in the township and place a full time fire chief in charge, with a chemical truck. He would direct the fight against the fire, using volunteer firemen.

With a fire truck in the township, it is believed farm fire losses could be greatly reduced and much loss prevented. Several rural communities now own fire trucks.

COPY OF FAMOUS SHIP IS MODELED BY SICK VET

A perfect copy of Hendik Hudson's schooner "Halve Maen" (Holf Moon) has been carved by Walter Hartman of Owosso, a World War veteran who has been confined to his bed for the past year due to tuberculosis of the bone.

aHrtman has used only his jackknife in the work. An idea of the painstaking work done may be gained from the fact that the ship has 700 knots in the ropes and lashings and 154 blocks and pulleys, all of them smaller than the end of a lead pencil. The blocks and pulelys are made of cork.

The model is a full rigged ship. The sails were cut and fitted after being trimmed with shellac.

DETROIT EXPORTS SHOW BIG GAIN

Detroit's total exports in 1926 was $272,375,000, or a gain of nearly 8 percent over the total of $252,275,000 in 1925; while the imports were $101,681,000, or a gain of about 20 per cent over the total of $84,247,000 for 1925.

The striking point about these figures is that they shoy Detroit to be the greatest exporting port in the United States except New York, New Orleans and Galveston. With the exception of the metropolis, there is no port on either of the United States ocean coasts that piles up as high an export business as Detroit.

Besides New York there are seven ports which surpass the Detroit total as to imports. Five of these are seaports—Boston, Baltimore, New Orleans, Los Angeles and Seattle—and two are interior ports—Buffalo and Rochester.

The Detroit exports for 1926 made a substantial increase, while the total exports of the country declined two per cent as compared with 1925. Buffalo's export total for 1926 was $191,673,000, comparing with $177,764,000 in 1925—a gain, but at a lower rate than Detroit's. No other interior port came anywhere near these figures.

Put in another way, the total of Detroit's exports in 1926 exceeded the combined total of the exports of Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore for the same year by $35,000,000.

"MAGIC" PRODICT AT ANN ARBOR

Alice, that charming lady of Lewis Carroll's ecquaintance, stepped thru the magic Looking Glass straight into Wonderland. There is slight resemblance between the ground glass door of a laboratory on the top floor of the new physics building and the miraculous mirror, but University of Michigan students are finding that a scientific wonderland, quite as fasdinating as that populated by Alice's friends, lies just beyond.

Two words, black lettered, on the glass, give but slight clue to the nature of the work being conducted. "Vacuum Tubes" says the sign, but if the casual cisitor, because of many a night spent in turning dial and rheostat, is inclineed to pass it by in the sincere belief that vacuum tubes refer only to detection and amplification of radio signals, he is passing over an opportunity to observe, once more, that the afe of miracles is most decidedly not dead.

Present day scientists ought to be as accustomed to modern miracles as to their breakfast bacon and—.

The fact remains that they are not. When, recently the American Physical Society hel its annual meeting in Ann Arbor, there were as many expressions of wonder and enthusiasm expressed at the carious laboratory demonstrations as one hears about a Christmas tree when Santa Claus has been especially generous in the matter of mechanical toys.

Perhaps a few demonstrations created quite the interest of that presented by Dr. Neil H. Williams, member of the University of Michigan faculty and known to the scientific world as co-inventor of a super-amplifier by means of which the bombardment of the vacuum tube plate by the invisible electrons is made to sound like hail on a tin roof.

What Dr. Williams did for the visiting physicists is nothing more than he does as part of his routine experiments before his class. He disclaims any credit for applying, in a practical way, a fairly well known psysical principal. Yet he admits that the experiment probably was first made at the University of Michigan and grants that it may be the fore runner of great things to come.

It is a fascinating thought—the control of energy by wireless. But that it goes beyond mere thought, is easily demonstratable. At a few dollars cost, anyone of the thousands who delight to putter with radio may construct a simple apparatus guaranteed to astound any audience. The old time palo magician with his bag full of shoddy ticks, his double faced cads, his false crown hat and all the rest of his ancient rubbish must take a rear seat, perhaps forever.

Like the magician, however, Dr. Williams makes use of a wand. Unlike the magician's, it is not used to distreat the attention of the audience while a live rabbit and a corsage of violets is being drawn from beneath the wizard's coat tails. The wand is of hard rubber and plays an essential pat in the scientific feat.

Dr. Williams addresses his class: "We will proceed to demonstrate in rather a striking way what you have just been studying.

"I shall now produce a small negative charge of electricity by rubbing this rubber wand priskly with a bit of wool. When the charged rod is brought within five or six feet of the 'tntenna'—what happens?

Suppose we connect an ordinary electric door bell to the local circuit. Let us see what happens."

The rubber is rubbed for a few seconds, is waved within six feet of the "antenna"—and the bell rings loudly until the wand is withdrawn or the minute negative charge is dissipated.

Undressed kid gloves may be cleaned by rubbing lightly with lne sandpaper.

Brush the top of biscuits or pastry with egg white before baking to secure a glaze.

INDIANS SAVED BY "POISONOUS" ROOTS FROM WINTER DEATH

The value of the roots of the water lily, as an article of food, is revealed in a legendary narrative told by the late Chief Fisher, of the Chippewa tribe of Indians, who at one time lived on a reservation in Genesee County. According to Chief Fisher's narrative there occurred, before any white men came to Michigan territory, a year of extreme cold. So frigid was the temperature that through the winter the Indians were unable to hunt. Animals in the forest died of the cold. The corn was frozen before it ripened and nut trees of all descriptions failed to bear. The Chippewas faced starvation. The tribe was encamped on the shores of a lake that heads up into the south western corner of Grand Blanc township and extends down into Oakland county. This lake appears in late atlases and maps, and is so called by a great many people, Copne-Conic. This is a misnomer, having no significance what ever, and is not the true name of the lake as will later be revealed. The tribe's medicine men who depended more upon superstitious rites than any other measures to effect cures among the ailing members of their tribe, had informed their fellow tribes men that the roots of the pond lilies, that grew so bountifully along the shores of the lake, were poisonous. But growing desperate from the pangs of unbearable hunger the Indians eventually dug a hole in the ground, lined it with stone into which they built a hot fire. As soon as the stone had become thoroughly hot the fire was raked out, and into this improvised fireless cooker a quantity of lily roots, that had been previously gathered, were placed and covered over to retain as much of the heat as possible. The Indians found that the roots so prepared were palatable and through this means were kept from starvation. They named the roots "Opin," which in the Chippewa language means "bread." The word "neconic," in the tribe's language, stood for lake. So that the true name of the lake is Opin-neconic, or bread lake. The Indians bestowing this title upon the waters in commemoration of the beneficient air its fruits, in the way of lily roots, had been in their time of need.

A few years ago, the farm known as the Handy farm, that borders this lake, was purchased by C. S. Mott of Flint, who has developed the property into an attractive home for destitute, orphan children.

The Baldwin apple tree, once a mortgage, lifter, is joining the Duchess in the class of unprofitable varieties in Michigan.

Orchardists have experienced much difficulty in recent years in obtaining fair prices for Baldwins. They are offering the fruit at practically the same prices as Ben Davis. In some instances where the two varieties were quoted together and at the same price, buyers have ordered Ben Davis in preference to Baldwins. The decline of the Baldwin apple in the public's appreciation largely has been due to introduction of new varieties, including the Delicious and McIntosh.

For years the Baldwin has ranked with the Northern Spy as a profitable variety. The Spy continues to be th king of Michigan apples, selling at top prices.

AUTO LEAPS 12 FOOT HOLE IN ICE, 3 IN FAMILY SAVED

Three lives were saved when an automobile in which Arthur Kilmurry, proprietor of the Elk Lake Inn, at Traverse City, his wife and son, Lucien, were riding jumped a 12-foot expanse of open water in the ice on Elk Lake.

Kilmurry was driving ocver the ice at high speed when the crack suddenly appeared ahead of the car. Too late to stop, he pressed on the accelerator and the the car made the leap, but several of the driver's ribs were broken and his car was damaged.

LOSES ONE POTATO SHOW, MAKES ITSELF ANOTHER

Greenville was outbid by Big Rapids for the 1927 Western Michigan Potato Show but not outsmarted. It is going to have a big potato show of its own.

The Greenville Potato Show Association has been prepected with E. W. Lincoln, former president of the Wesaern Michigan show, as its president. It has 151 members who propose to stage a big exposition early in November.

Paul Riddick, editor of the Greenville News, is vice-president.

SCOUTS 20 DAYS AS FARMING YEAR

Can the work of producing staple crops, to which farmers now give a year, be done in 20 days?

Henry Ford says that it can. But the "Master Farmers" of Michigan, chosen as the most efficient of all the state's 190,000, want to be shown.

Here, in brief, are some of their comments:

"The Indians beat him to it."

"It strikes me as a huge joke."

"He has forgotten about the weather."

"As a farmer, Henry Ford is a wonder at making automobiles."

"It's all right for a one-crop section, but it has no place in Michigan, where diversified farming is practiced."

"What American agriculture really needs is an American price for its products."

These Master Farmers are men who excel in their business, just as Henry Ford does in his—though, of course, they are not rated in Wall Street at a billion or two. They are good managers, they are alert to the findings of science, they use machinery wherever they can, they keep careful records, they make use of advertising, they write their letters on printed stationery—in short, they are modern business men. And they find time, besides, to take the lead in community affairs and to help the co-operative movement along.

Inasmuch as these men have given their lives to a close study of the very problem that Mr. Ford proposes to attack, their opinions are not without worth. Perhaps they are overly skeptical. Many supposedly wise men have disagreed with Mr. Ford in the past, and he has proved them wrong. But at least these Master Farmers have turned the spotlight on the difficulties that Mr. Ford must overcome if he succeeds in industrializing agriculture.

M. E. Parmelee of Hilliards, Mich., who called Mr. Ford's idea a "huge joke," said:

"One thing he hasn't taken into consideration is the weather. It will upset his plans over night."

"I have felt for years," he continued "that the agricultural problem will be nearest solved by following a diversity of farm crops and labor throughout the year. Have the jobs so well organized that they will dovetail together and yet not conflict in the time they have to be done. Thus they will give steady employment the year around."

Mr. Parmelee's 190 acre Cherry Rill Stock Farm in Allegan county, has been for years a mecca for farmers milk, eggs and potatoes. He keeps 40 head of dairy cattle and 400 hens; and he raises corn, wheat, potatoes, alfalfa, oats and apples. His hens, in this winter weather, are averaging 77 per cent production. His Holstein cows are among the highest producers in the state. His 15-acre potato field averages around 400 bushels to the acre, year in and year out.

He uses electriciay for lighting his buildings, including his hen house, and for pumping water. Carriers suspended from pulleys which trafel on overhead tracks convey feed and manure about the barn. A gasoline engine runs three milking machines that do all the milking. A tractor performs the heavy field work, fills the silo and grinds all the feed consumed on the farm. Hay and potatoes are hoisted into the barn by a gas engine. The potato sprayer and digger, though horse drawn are power driven. Aso the potatoes are graded by machine.

Another man who stresses the importance of the weather in any scheme of farm management is Paul C. Clement, of Britton. Mr. Clement, formerly a typical Lenawee county corn farmer and stock feeder, has built up a seed corn business which now occupies most of his time. He took first prize last year in the annual corn profit conest conducted by the Michigan Crop Improvement association.

The best percolated coffee is made by using a large quantity of coffee with cold water, and allowing it to boil only three minutes.

DIGS TO FREEDOM WITH SPOON THROUGH 15 INCH BRICK WALL

Milo Keep, the first man to be convicted under the Michigan habitual criminal act since its discovery on the statute books some weeks ago, dug his way out of the Kalamazoo County Jail and escaped.

Keep got away through a hole about 14 inches in diameter which had been dug through a brick wall 15 inches thick. Keep had no instrument except a tablespoon to aid him in his digging.

BUMPER STRAWBERRY CROP IN U. S. FORECAST

All indications point to a bumper crop of strawberries this season, said a bulletin from the government bureau of agricultural economics.

The forecast, however, contains an important proviso, namely, that weather conditions hold favorable.

Translated for non-agriculturists, a bumper crop of strawberries is indicated as meaning more than a fourth of a million quarts with a farm value approximately $50,000,000.

WHISTLE AND SONG LOSS VALUE PUT AT $20,000

ability to whistle and sing, as a result of being hit in the mouth by a golf ball last May, Dr. Paul Arnold Peterson, pastor of First Presbyterian church, Pontiac, has begun suit in Oakland circuit court for $20,000 damages.

C. G. McCollom of Detroit, whose ball is said to have inflicted the injury, is the defendant.

POULTRY ALSO THRIVES ON A DIET OF SKIM MILK

Surplus skim milk and whey is a valuable poultry feed, the Department of Agriculture advises farmers and poultry raisers.

Milk sugar has a definite function of controlling digestive disturbances among fowls and aids in reducing losses among chickens infected with coccidiasis, experiments made by the Government showed.

LETTUCE INDUSTRY IN STATE FACING BIG WEST TRADE WAR

California is 2000 miles from Michigan, yet the plight of the iceberg lettuce growers of Imperial Valley is of growing importance to the vegetable forcing industry in Grand Rapids.

Head lettuce production in Imperial Valley was increased to a point this season where the returns are beginning to show red ink, according to trade reports reaching Grand Rapids. California lettuce farmers have appealed to the United States Department of Agriculture to send one of its marketing specialists to Imperial Valley to study their problem and assist in finding a solution.

How the westerners will attempt to solve their over production is of prime importance to Michigan growers of hot house leaf lettuce. If they decide to reduce their acreage next season, growers believe there will be no cause for worry on their part. But should the western growers decide to stimulate consumption of iceberg lettuce by means of advertising, Michigan growers fear the consequences.

Any further increase in the consumption of head lettuce probable would be at the expense of the leaf lettuce industry in Michigan and in Ohio.

5 TOWNS VIE FOR STATE SPUD EXPERIMENT DEPOT

Five important potato shippers points in Michigan's potato belt are bidding for the potato experiment station which the state department of agriculture proposes to establish if the legislature approves a $25,000 appropriation requested for that purpose.

The bidders are Greenville, Lake City, Gaylord, Manton and Cadillac. It is possible that Cadillac may withdraw from the contest in favor of Manton, which also is located in Wexford County.

The strongest contenders are Lake City, Greenville and Gaylord. The farm crops department of Michigan State College, which would operate the station, has indicated that it favors a location in either Missaukee or Wexford Counties, which would place the experimental farm about midway between the main certified seed producing area in Michigan and the main table stock area in lower Michigan.

VOICES NEW IDEA OF PRISON TERM

New prison system under which the warden, not the judge, would determine the length of the prison inmate's term, is advocated by Charles A. Blaney, of Kalamazoo, for 10 years a member of the Michigan State Prison Commission.

His chief complaint against the present prison system in the maximum and minimum terms. "A definite sentence can never set the day on which it will be safe for society to have the prisoner released," he says. "You might as well commit the insane to a definite period in the state hospital or diseased persons to definite periods in other hospitals. It is more dangerous to society to release a defective or deliberate criminal from prison than to permit persons infected with communicable diseases to mingle freely with others on the streets and in other public places."

Under the system produced by Mr. Blaney reformatories and penitentiaries would be divided into five departments. The first, the receiving department, would be an observational division into which the incoming convicts would be taken for a period long enough to enable medical experts to classify the individual's type of criminality. This Mr. Glaney regards as an essential feature.

The second department would be reserved for those sorted out as habitual or deliberate criminals. Release from this department would be virtually impossible. This department would receive prisoners for whose reformation eypert penologists could not offer any hope. The third department would receive defectives. Cure, rather than punishment, would be the aim of this division. The fourth would be the probationary department, to which would be sent criminals they believed on the way to reformation. The fifth, the liberty department would receive prisoners to be fitted out for their return to society.

BIG OLIVER DAY

On Wednesday North Adams had a big day for the farmers of this section inaugurated by John M. Williams who is the local Oliver agent here and sponsored by the Oliver Manufacturing Company of South Bend, Indiana, who are building special machinery for the destruction of the corn borer, Hillsdale County being a part of the borer infested area of Southern Michigan, the Government Agricultural Station at Washington is sending out experts to visit this region and on Wednesday the Government was represented by Mr. Bacon who gave a very interesting talk on the pest.

Mr. Sellers talked on the Implements made by the Oliver Company and the science of fighting the corn borer which is so necessary at this time and which most of the farmers should be vitally interested in. The day seemed ideal for the occasion and early in the forenoon the busy hum of tractors heralded an event of importance. The streets resembled a Carnival, and more than 200 farmers assembled in town and all we are sure, went away with a mighty good opinion of the Oliver organization and their implements which have been sold so generally by Mr. Williams for 36 years past. The gathering was in charge of State Agent Mr. Allen .Over 200 free lunches were served by the managers.

Let Us Help You With Your Fence Work

WHETHER you are going to put up boundary, cross or temporary fences see us first. We can save you a lot of hard work and valuable time. We'll show you how one man can do a week's fencing job in one day and get a fence line that will last for many years—one that in the long run gets the most years of service from the fence and proves to be the cheapest investment in fencing that you ever made.

The secret of it is RED TOP Steel Posts—that can be driven into any condition of soil any time of the year—that can be driven at the rate of 200 to 300 a day by one man and aligned perfectly—that cost less in the long run by outlasting 4 or 5 ordinary posts, saving cost, valuable time and expensive labor—that get the most years of useful service out of any fence by holding it in steady security year after year.

Red Top

GUARANTEED

Steel Fence Posts

Because we handle nothing but the best merchandise we handle RED TOP posts. We know it to be made of tough, springy, long-lived railroad steel—that none is better no matter how much you may pay for it—that thousands of RED TOPS are giving this extraordinary service today after many years in the fence lines of American farmers. And RED TOPS can be easily withdrawn and re-driven in a new location, making the changing of a fence line comparatively easy.

Come in and let us show you how you can save money on fencing, and make it a quick and easy job.

GRAVES & FORD LUMBER COMPANY

TOWN COP FOR 40 YEARS---QUITS

How must it seem to have been the peace officer in the home town so many years that the oldest inhabitant can scarcely remember of anybody else filling the job? To have served as a sort of walking curfew for four whole school generations, until scattered over the natio nare men—and women, too—of middle age or lesser years, who look back and smile as they recall who once or twice upon a time they legged it for home to same themselves from being arrested for life.

Clarence Jerome Noot has been for 40 years constable, marshal or deputy sheriff—one, both or all—of the village of Stockridge, Michigan.

"For forty years I've met 'em on the street and it's always been 'Good morning, Mister Nott!'—just as innocent as lambs—and in five minutes that young one'll be up to something or other. Seems as if he hankers to see how fast a 71-year-old officer can really run."

Nott thinks that 40 years is long enough for anybody to be peace officer. Eo some tife ago he passed out the solemn announcement that on the first day of March, A. D. 1927, he was going to resign.

"Remember how the farmer girls would come to town Saturday evenings, and walk around the square, up and down, back and forth, till you'd think they'd walk their legs off, right in front of those stores? Well, they don't do that any more.

"Well, they've lost the habit since the autos and the movies have come. Then, too, they're educated better. They have got more sense."

Here was a hint of what the continuous work of a high school will do for the rural community. Stockbridge was just graduating its first classes 30 years ago—one to five in membership. Now, with no marked increase in population, a dozen or 15 graduates a year is the rule in this typical Michigan village of less than a thounsand souls. Then, a college graduate was an importation; now they are scattered around the countryside like bumble bees in June clover.

"Eternal triangles? There's one thing I've noticed that $ wish every married man or woman could be made to see," says Contable Nott. "That is, when you see one of a married couple running off to dances and the other staying home, there's breakers ahead. My advice is that they both go, or else what's better, both stay at home. Jim don't care for dances any more, but his wife is still crazy about them. She takes are car and goes. Pretty soon Jim wakes up too late to find some fellow has won his iwfe's affections. That's bad for Jim.

"Crime waves? They don't come our way. That's most all in the big cities. You'd think from the papers that the whole nation was going to the dogs—but don't you believe it. Back where the real American people live, we have a finer,nobler, better set of folks than we ever had; ever so much better than when I started in as town constable back there in 1886."

MONROE MAN REPORTS FLOCKS OF WILD GEESE

Fred Willetts, manager of the Monroe Marsh club house, reports having seen many flocks of wild geese hovering about Lake Erie, a half a mile east of the club house, where the lake is free of ice. He has seen but few ducks so far.

MUSKEGON SCHOOL WILL HONOR STAR ATHLETE

Muskegon high school will honor the memory of J. Francis Jacks, a former star athlete of the school and later its coach.

It has been decided that a bronze tablet is to be placed in the main hall at the entrance of the Senior high school building. The memorial will be purchased by the high school students.

Jacks brought several state foot ball and basket ball championships to Muskegon during his coaching days. He was a star foot ball player in the days of Coach Robert Zuppke.

QUARANTINED HOUSE'S POPULATION GAINS EIGHT

Officers guarded a tenement house at Muskegon Heights night and day to enforce a quarantine for small pox. Now, the officials are trying to figure how there happened to be eight more men in the place when the quarantine was lifted than there was when it was established.

The city was feeding those under quarantine.

It is usually the forward boy who is backward at school.

Self-made men would be all right if they didn't talk shop.

30 ATHLETES AT STATE HONORED

Sixty Michigan State athletes were given sweaters for their participation in winter sports. Awards were not made in track, hockey, varsity swimming and fencing, the track letters being given at the close of the spring campaign. Swimming, hockey and fencing letters will be announced at a later date.

Nine major letters were awarded—seven in basket ball and two in wrestling. This is the first time in the history of the college that major awards have been made in wrestling.

The grapplers given letters were Capt. Alird W. Bergquist of Hudson, Michigan, and Frank Gibbs of Whitehall, Michigan. Both are seniors. Gibbs was also given a gold award in recognition of the fact that he has never been beaten in three years of varsity competition. Bergquist was the first State wrestling captain to lead his team to a victorious season and in addition he won individual bouts against two strong Western Conference teams and led State against Michigan when the Spartans made the best score that has been registered this year against the undefeated conference champions.

Coach Ralph Leonard, in his first year as wrestling coach at State, scored 106 points against 77 for opponents.

Basket ball men who were given major letters on the recommendation of Coach Ben Vanalstyne were Capt. Kenneth Drew of Adrian, Carleton Colvin of East Lansing, Oliver Hood of Ioania, Vern Dickeson of Highland Park, Carl Felt and Louis Smith of Muskegon, and Robert Eldred of Eaton Rapids.

Smith was the only senior in the group.

Included among the freshmen swimmers to win numerals was Katsumi Kometani of Honolulu, Hawaii, the best breast stroke swimmer that State has ever had. He will be a valuable addition to the varsity next year.

JUSTICE IS SLOW BUT GRINDS SURE

"He had it coming to him."

Sometimes that sounds rather as if one were gloating over the other fellow's bad luck, but as a matter of fact it is just another way of expressing the universal feeling that though the wheels of justice may be slow, they eventually grind their grist.

All of us like to see justice done, whether it comes in the form of a reward or a punishment. And because it is often delayed we can't help voicing our satisfaction when he see it work out.

As a matter of fact, we always do get what is coming to us. Justice is always triumphant, and the reason we don't see it is because we are looking for our conception of it, and not for the real thing.

We see a man bludgeoning his way to the top in the business world, ruining rivals, and getting by with it. Everything seems to fall his way; he gets richer and richer, and more and more powerful. We pray to see him humbled and broken, and he greets us each day with even more insolence as he piles up more millions.

Then we declare bitterly that there is no justice, or that fellow would get what is coming to him.

He is getting it every day, but the trouble is we can't see it. He is getting his deserts in the form of a shriveled soul, a warped mind, a heart full of selfishness and falsehood, the piled up hatreds of the people he has oppressed, and in the lack of respect of those who once loved him.

That doesn't satisfy us, however. We are too materialistic. We want to see fate step in and lay him cold; we want him sand bagged and robbed of his ill gotten gains, reduced to penury and left to meditate on his sins, while his victims are elevated to power and riches and honor in good old fairy story style.

Unfortunately, fate seldom obliges us to that ertent. Justice chooses more subtle methods, but they are none the less effective.

Worry, suspicion,jealousy "that eats like the canker i the bud," hatred, portion of the man who robs and defrauds.

He gets what's coming to him, but we don't see it.

When rolling out the last of doughnut mixtures, try rolling in a few fancy currants. Then cut in small fancy shapes and fry in the usual manner. The kiddies will like them—the grown-ups, too.

"Follow The Arrow"--A Spring Millinery Hint

We kind of thought you feminine readers might be watching these pictures for some new fashion hints—now that spring is so near. And we're not going to disappoint you.

Here's a charming millinery creation by Bruck-Weiss—a hat that is a combination of orchid-pleated felt and fruttel straw, adorned with a rhinestone arrow. As the designers say—"it breaths the very spirit of the outdoors!"

DEFIES PUGS THAT HOLD WORLD BELT

Ajax defied the lightning and Hercules was rated tough, too, but they never knew Homer Smith, secretary-treasurer of a company manufacturing silos at Kalamazoo.

In addition to being a manufacturer he is a pugilist. He has fought Dempsey, Wills, Firpo, RenDault, Brennan, Meehan, Sharkey, aPoulino, Johnson and more than 100 other selected bone crushers, and still lives to fight another day.

Homer Smith did not stop any of these opponents but he fought them. Dempsey stopped him in a round, Wills in two, and Paoulini in seven. Smith lost decisions to Jack Johnson, Battling Levinsky, Jack Sharkey and to Jack Renault. He boxed no decision bouts against Firpo, Meehan and with Brennan.

If a belt should be awarded for the boxer establishing the best record for horizontal contact with the canvas, Homer would be a contender. Reports differ as to the number of times Firpo floored him. Smith says it was "something over ten times; I lost count."

"I've fought the hardest bunch of any man in the ring today," declared Smith. "And nobody put his trademark on me, either. The only bones I've been getting broken in the ring are my right hand. It's been broken once in a while.

"I believe I came close to beating Dempsey when I fought him. Soon after the fight started I got him on the chin so hard his hands dropped. But I was too slow about following it up. And the next thing I knew his left caught me on the chin and he floored me."

Smith is willing to go taking a chance at being knocked down some more and when he finally gets tired, he says he can always build silos.

SAVING WAPITI FROM FATE OF BUFFALO SPORTSMEN'S AIM

Wapiti, the stately elk, the most beautiful as well as the most interesting of our remaining wild animals, now that buffalo survive only in a few preserves, is occupying the attention throughout the nation.

Once common to the entire country, it is now numerous only in the states of Wyoming, Idaho and Montana, and its survival there seems dependent only on the privisions made by the federal government and the Isaak Walton league for artificial feeding during the severe winter months, when the els, following their usual habits, come down out of the mountains to the lowlands for their winter feeding.

The elk is the largest of the red deer family and closely resembles its smaller brother, the European stag. The wapiti is not properly an elk, as the European elk is more closely allied to the American moose.

Elk were once numerous in Michigan and their presence left its record by the numerfous use of the name in designating rivers, towns, cities, etc., as witness Elk lake, Elk townships, Elk river, Elk Rapids.

Today a few exist in public and private parks. The state owns a considerable herd on the Handson game reserve near Grayling and the Cleveland Cliffs Mining company has a sizeable number on Grand island, but as a wild animal in Michigan, they have gone the way of the buffalo, the turkey and the passenger pigeon.

CAPAC TURNS OUT TO SEE STRANGE GUEST OF JAIL

The village jail at Capac has been empty so long that the villagers turned out en masse to gaze at a luckless truck driver who was arrested recently for driving while intoxicated and was put in the jail to await officers from Port Huron to take hm to the county jail. There was a time many years ago when the village bastile was pretty well patronized during week ends, and some times on the week days. But of late years an occupant is a curiosity deemed worth of a look.

Check-Signing Machines Speed Up Pension Bureau Payroll

Pay day—that most beloved of days with everybody—still comes to 530,000 old soldiers and retired civil service employees every month. Their checks from Uncle Sam, totaling approximately $20,000,000, involve a tremendous amount of work—not the least of which is the check signing. This is done by a number of multiple machines, one of which is shown above. Seated in front of it is Mr. Elmer E. Miller, disbursing officer of the U. S. Pension Bureau, who has charge of the payroll.

Your Prosperity Hinges on the Prosperity of Your Home Town Merchant

DR. MANETTE'S MANUSCRIPT

By Charles Dickens

I, Alexander Manette, unfortunate physician, native of Beauvais, and afterwards resident in Paris, write this melancholy paper in my dismal cell in the Bastille, during the last month of the year 1767. I write it at stolen intervals, under every difficulty. I design to secrete it in the wall of the chimney, where I have slowly and laboriously made a place of concealment for it. Some pitying hand may find it there, when I and my sorrows are dust.

"These words are formed by the rusty iron point with which I write with difficulty in scrapings of soot and charcoal from the chimney, mixed with blood, in the last month of the tenth year of my captivity. Hope has quite departed from my breast. I know from terrible warnings I have noted in myself that my reason will not long remain unimpaired, but I solemnly declare that I am at this time in the possession of my right mind—that my memory is exact and circumstantial—and that I write the truth as I shall answer for these my last recorded words, whether they be ever read by men or not, at the Eternal Judgment seat.

"One cloudy moonlight night in the third week of December (I think the twenty-second of the month) in the year 1757, I was walking on a retired part of the quay by the Seine for the refreshment of the frosty air, at an hour's distance from my place of residence in the Street of the School of Medicine, when a carriage came along behind me, driven very fast. As I stood aside to let that carriage pass, apprehensive that it might otherwise run me down, a head was put out at the window, and a voice called to the driver to stop.

"The carriage stopped as soon as the driver could rein in his horses, and the same voice called to me by name. I answered. The carriage was then so far in advance of me that two gentlemen had time to open the door and alight before I came up with it. I observed that they were both wrapped in cloaks, and appeared to conceal themselves. As they stood side by side near the carriage door I also observed that they both looked of about my own age, or rather younger, and that they were greatly alike, in stature, manner, voice, and (as far as I could see) face, too.

"'You are Doctor Manette?' said one.

"'I am.'

"'Doctor Manette, formerly of Beauvais,' said the other; 'the young physician, originally an expert surgeon, who within the last year or two made a rising reputation in Paris?'

"'Gentlemen,' I returned, 'I am that Doctor Manette of whom you speak so graciously.'

"'We have been to your residence,' said the first, 'and not being so fortunate as to find you there, and being informed that you were probably walking in this direction, we followed, in the hope of overtaking you. Will you please to enter the carriage.

"The maner of both was imperious, and they both moved, as these words were spoken, so as to place me between themselves and the carriage door. They were armed. I was not.

"'Gentlemen,' said I 'pardon me; but I usually inquire who does me the honor to seek my assistance, and what is the nature of the case to which I am summoned.'

"The reply to this was made by him who had spoken second. 'Doctor, your clients are people of condition. As to the nature of the case, our confidence in your skill assures us that you will ascertain it for yourself better than we can describe it. Enough. Will you please to enter the carriage?'

"I could do nothing but comply, and I entered it in silence. They both entered after me—the last springing in, after putting up the steps. The carriage turned about, and drove on at its former speed.

"I repeat this conversation exactly as it occurred. I have no doubt that it is, word for word, the same. I describe everything exactly as it took place, constraining my mind not to wander from the task. Where I make the broken marks that follow, I leave off for the time, and put my paper in its hiding place. . . . .

"The carriage left the streets behind, passed the North Barrier, and emerged upon the country road. At two-thirds of a league from the Barrier—I did not estimate the distance at that time, but afterwards when I traversed it—it struck out of the main avenue, and presently stopped at a solitary house. We all three alighted, and walked, by a damp soft footpath to the door of the house. It was not opened immediately, in answer to the ringing of the bell, and one of my two conductors struck the man who opened it, with his heavy riding glove, across the face.

"There was nothing in this action to attract my particular attention, for I had seen common people struck more commonly than dogs. But the other of the two, being angry likewise, struck the man in like manner with his arm; the look and bearing of the brothers were then so exactly alike that I then first perceived them to be twin brothers.

"From the time of our alighting at the outer gate (which we found locked, and which one of the brothers had opened to admit us, and had relocked), I had heard cries proceeding from an upper chamber. I was conducted to this chamber straight, the cries growing louder as we ascended the stairs, and I found a patient in a high fever of the brain, lying on a bed.

"The patient was a woman of great beauty and young; assuredly not much past twenty. Her hair was torn and ragged, and her arms were bound to her sides with cashes and handkerchiefs. I noticed that these bonds were all portions of a gentleman's dress. On one of them, which was a fringed scarf for a dress of ceremony, I saw the armorial bearings of a Noble and the letter E.

"I saw this within the first minute of my contemplation of the patient; for, in her restless strivings she had turned over on her face on the edge of the bed, had drawn the end of the scarf into her mouth, and was in danger of suffocation. My first act was to put out my hand to relieve her breathing; and, in moving the scarf aside, the embroidery in the corner caught my sight.

"I turned her gently over, placed my hands upon her breast to calm her and keep her down, and looked into her face. Her eyes were dilated and wild, and she constantly uttered piercing shrieks, and repeated the words, 'My husband, my father and my brother!' and then counted up to twelve, and said, 'Hush!' For an instant, and no more, she would pause to listen, and then the piercing shrieks would begin again and she would repeat the cry, 'My husband, my father, and my brother!' and would count up to twelve and say 'Hush!' There was no variation in the order, or the manner. There was no cessation, but the regular moment's pause, in the utterance of these sounds.

"'How long,' I asked, 'has this lasted?'

"To distinguish the brothers, I will call them the elder and the younger; by the elder, I mean him who exercised the most authority. It was the elder who replied, 'Since about this hour last night.'

"'She has a husband, a father, and a brother?'

"'A brother.'

"'I do not address her brother?'

"He answered with great contempt, 'No.'

"'She has some recent association with the number twelve?"

"The younger brother impatiently rejoined, 'With twelve o'clock?'

"'See, gentlemen,' I said, still keeping my hands upon her breast, 'how useless I am, as you have brought me! If I had known what I was coming to see, I could have come provided. As it is, time must be lost. There are no medicines to be obtained in this lonely place.'

"The elder brother looked to the younger, who said haughtily, 'There is a case of medicines here,' and brought it from a closet, and put it on the table. . . .

"I opened some of the bottles and smelt them, and put the stoppers to my lips. If I had wanted to use anything save narcotic medicines that were poisons in themselves, I would not have administered any of those.

"'Do you doubt them?' asked the younger brother.

"'You see, monsieur, I am going to use them,' I replied, and said no more.

"I made the patient swallow with great difficulty, and after many efforts, the dose that I desired to give. As I intended to repeat it after a while, and as it was necessary to watch its influence, I then sat down by the side of the bed. There was a timid and suppressed woman in attendance (wife of the man downstairs), who had retreated into a corner. The house was damp and decayed, indifferently furnished—evidently, recently occupied and temporarily used. Some thick old hangings had been nailed up before the windows, to deaden the sound of the shrieks. They continued to be uttered in their regular succession, with the cry, 'My husband, my father, and my brother!' the counting up to twelve, and 'Hush!' The frenzy was so violent, that I had not unfastened the bandages restraining the arms; but I had looked to them, to see that they were not painful. The only spark of encouragement in the case was that my hand upon the sufferer's breast had this much soothing influence that for minutes at a time it transquillised the figure. It had no effect upon the cries, no pendulum could be more regular.

"For the reason that my hand had this effect (I assume), I had sat by the side of the bed for half an hour, with the two brothers looking on, before the elder said:

"'There is another patient.'

"I was startled, and asked, 'Is it a pressing case?'

"'You had better see,' he carelessly answered; and took up a light. . . .

"The other patient lay in a back room across a second staircase, which was a species of loft over a stable. There was a low plastered ceiling to a part of it; the rest was open, to the raidge of the tiled roof, and there were beams across. Hay and straw were stored in that portion of the place, fagots for firing, and a heap of apples in sand. I had to pass through that part, to get at the other. My memory is circumstantial and unshaken. I try it with these details, and I see them all, in this my cell in the Bastille, near the close of the tenth year of my captivity, as I saw them all that night.

"On some hay on the ground, with a cushion thrown under his head, lay a handsome peasant boy—a boy of not more than seventeen at the most. He lay on his back, with his teeth set, his right hand clenched on his breast, and his glaring eyes looking straight upward. I could not see where his wound was, as I kneeled on one knee over him; but, I could see that he was lying of a wound from a sharp point.

"'I am a doctor, my poor fellow,' said I. 'Let me examine it.'

"'I do not want is examined,' he answered; 'let it be.'

"It was under his hand, and I soothed him to let me move his hand away. The wound was a sword-like thrust, received from twenty to twenty-four hours before, but no skill could have saved him if it had been looked to without delay. He was then dying fast. As I turned my eyes to the elder brother, I saw him looking down at this handsome boy whose wounded bird, or hare, or rabbit; not at all as if he were a fellow creature.

"'How has this been done, monsieur?' said I.

"'A crazed young common dog! A serf! Forced my brother to draw upon him, and has fallen by my brother's sword—like a gentleman.'

"There was no touch of pity, sorrow, or kindred humanity, in this answer. The speaker seemed to acknowledge that it was inconvenient to have that different order of creature dying there, and that it would have been better if he had died in the usual obscure routine of his vermine kind. He was quite incapable of any compassionate feeling about the boy, or about his fate.

"The boy's eyes had slowly moved to him as he had spoken, and they now slowly moved to me.

"'Doctor, they are very proud, these Nobles; but we common dogs are proud too, sometimes. They plunder us, outrage us, beat us, kill us; but we have a little pride left, sometimes. She—have you seen her, Doctor?"

"The shrieks and the cries were audible there, though subdued by the distance. He referred to them, as if she were lying in our presence.

"I said, 'I have seen her.'

"'She is my sister, Doctor. They have had their shameful rights, these Nobles, in the modesty and virtue of our sisters, many years, but we have had good girls among us. I know it, and have heard my father say so. She was a good girl. She was betrothed to a good young man, too; a tenant of his. We were all tenants of his—that man's who stands there. The other is his brother, the worst of a bad race.'

"It was with the greatest difficulty that the boy gathered bodily force to speak; but, his spirit spoke with a dreadful emphasis.

"'We were so robbed by that man who stands there, as all we common dogs are by those superior Beings—taxed by him without mercy, obliged to work for him without pay, obliged to grind our corn at his mill, obliged to feed scores of his tame birds on our wretched crops, and forbidden for our lives to keep a single tame bird of our own, pillaged and plundered to that degree that when we chanced to have a bit of meat, we ate it in fear, with the door barred and the shutters closed, that his people should not see it and take it from us—I say, we were so robbed, and hunted, and were made so poor, that our father told us it was a dreadful thing to bring a child into the world, and that what we should most pray for was that our women might be barren and our miserable race die out!'

"I had never before seen the sense of being oppressed, bursting forth like a fire. I had supposed that it must be latent in the people somewhere; but I had never seen it break out, until I saw it in the dying boy.

"'Nevertheless, Doctor, my sister married. He was ailing at that time, poor fellow, and she married her lover, that she might tend and comfort him in our cottage—our dog hut, as that man would call it. She had not been married many weeks, when that man's brother saw her and admired her, and asked that man to lend her to him—for what are husbands among us! He was willing enough, but my sister was good and virtuous, and she hated his brother with a hatred as strong as mine. What did the two then, to persuade her husband to use his influence with her, to make her willing?'

"The boy's eyes, which had been fixed on mine, slowly turned to the looker-on, and I saw in the two faces that all he said was true. The two opposing kinds of pride confronting one another, I can see, even in this Bastille; the gentleman's, all negligent indifference; the peasant's, all trodden down sentiment, and passionate revenge.

"'You know, Doctor, that it is among the Rights of these Nobles to harness us common dogs to carts, and drive us. They so harnessed him and drove him. You know that it is among their Rights to keep us in their grounds all night, quieting the frogs, in order that their noble sleep may not be disturbed. They kept him out in the unwholesome mists at night, and ordered him back into harness in the day. But he was not persuaded. No! Taken out of harness one day at noon, to feed—if he could find food—he sobbed twelve times, once for every stroke of the bell, and died on her bosom.'

"Nothing human could have held life in the boy but his determination to tell all his wrong. He forced back the gathering shadows of death as he forced his clinched right hand to remain clenched, and to cover his wound.

"'Then, with that man's permission and even with his aid, his brother took her away; in spite of what I know she must have told his brother—and what that is, will not be long unknown to you, Doctor, if it is now—his brother took her away—for his pleasure and diversion, for a little while. I saw her pass me on the road. When I took tidings home, our father's heart burst; he never spoke one of the words that filled it. I took my young sister (for I have another) to a place beyond the reach of this man, and where, at least, she will never be his vassal. Then, I tracked the brother here, and last night I climbed in—a common dog, but sword in hand. Where is the loft window? It was somewhere here?'

"The room was darkening to his sight; the world was narrowing around him. I glanced about me, and saw that the hay and straw were trampled over the floor, as if there had been a struggle.

"'She heard me and ran in. I told her not to come near us till he was dead. He came in and first tossed me some pieces of money; then struck at me with a whip. But I though a common dog, so struck at him as to make him draw. Let him break into as many pieces as he will, the sword that he stained with my common blood; he drew to defend himself—thrust at me with all his skill for his life.'

"My glance had fallen, but a few moments before, on the fragments of a broken sword, lying among the hay. That weapon was a gentleman's. In another place lay an old sword that seemed to have been a soldier's.

"'Now, life me, Doctor, lift me up. Where is he?'

"'He is not here,' I said, supporting the boy, and thinking that he referred to the brother.

"'He! Proud as these Nobles are, he is afraid to see me. Where is the man who was here? Turn my face to him.'

"I did so, raising the boy's head against my knee. But, invested for the moment with extraordinary power, he raised himself completely; obliging me to rise too, or I could not have still supported him.

"'Marquis,' said the boy, turned to him with his eyes opened wide, and his right hand raised, 'in the days when all these things are to be answered for, I summon you and yours, to the last of your bad race, to answer for them. I mark this cross of blood upon him; as a sign that I do it.'

"Twice he put his hand to the wound in his breast, and with his forefinger drew a cross in the air. He stood for an instant with the finger yet raised, and as it dropped, he dropped with it, and I laid him down dead. . . . .

"When I returned to the bedside of the young woman, I found her raving in precisely the same order of continuity. I knew that this might last for many hours, and that it would probably end in the silence of the grave.

"'Doctor, finding my brother in this difficulty with these hinds, I recommended that your aid be invited. Your reputation is high and as a young man with your fortune to make, you are probably mindful of your interest. The things that you see here, are things to be seen, and not spoken of.'

"I listened to the patient's breathing, and avoided answering. 'Do you honor me with your attention, Doctor?'

"'Monsieur,' said I, 'in my profession, the communications of patients are always received in confidence.' I was guarded in my answer, for I was troubled in my mind with what I had heard and seen.

"Her breathing was so difficult to trace that I carefully tried the pulse and the heart. There was life, and no more. Looking round as I resumed my seat, I found both the brothers intent upon me. . . .

"I repeated the medicines I had given her, and I sat at the side of the bed until the night was far advanced. She never abated the piercing quality of her shrieks, never stumbled in the distinctness or the order of her words. They were always "My husband, my father, and my brother. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, twelve. Hush!'

"This lasted twenty-six hours from the time when I first saw her. I had come and gone twice, and was again sitting by her, when she began to falter. I did what little could be done to assist that opportunity and bye and bye she sank into a lethargy, and lay like the dead.

"It was as if the wind and the rain had lulled at last, after a long and fearful storm. I released her arms, and called the woman to assist me to compose her figure and the dress she had torn. It was then that I knew her condition to be that of one in whom the first expectations of being a mother have arisen; and it was then that I lost the little hope I had had of her.

"'Is she dead?' asked the Marquis, whom I will still describe as the elder brother, coming booted into the room from his horse. 'Not dead,' I said, 'but like to die.'

"'What strength there is in these common bodies!' he said, looking down at her with some curiosity.

"'There is prodigious strength,' I answered him, 'in sorrow and despair.'

"I write with so much difficulty, the cold is so severe, I am so fearful of being detected and consigned to an underground cell and total darkness, that I must abridge this narrative. There is no confusion of failure in my memory; it can recall, and could detail, every word that was ever spoken between me and those brothers.

"She lingered for a week. Toward the last, I could understand some few syllables that she said to me, by placing my ear close to her lips. She asked me where she was, and I told her! who I was, and I told her. It was in vain that I asked her for her family name. She faintly shook her head upon the pillow, and kept her secret, as the boy had done.

"I had no opportunity of asking her any question, until I had told the brothers she was sinking fast, and could not live another day. Until then though no one was ever presented to her consciousness save the woman and myself, one or the other of them had always jealously sat behind the curtain at the head of the bed when I was there. But when it came to that, they seemed careless what communication I might hold with her; as if—the thought passed through my mind—I were dying too.

A WEE BIT OF SCOTCH TO THIS SHOPPING FROCK

A bit o'Scotch gives vim and vigor to the charming little shopping frock worn by Yola D'Avril in the photo above. It's one of the new attractive spring creations.

Hirsch of Los Angeles, in designing the costume, took the smart vivid Scotch plaid and developed a flattering jabot that should appeal to girls. Narrow bands of the plaid at the cuffs, at the collar and atop two pockets at either side add a jaunty touch. The skirt is shirred from the waistline down to the edge of the blouse and falls in gathers to the hemline.

CRIME IS LAID TO PIONEER BRIGAND

Every time a grand old mid west pioneer robbed an American Indian he made it just that much easier for a 1927 gangster to hi-jack a truckload of bootleg alcohol.

Every time great and good business men of the '80s carved out his destinies in these parts by winking an eye at state and federal law in order to build up a nice new railroad, or start a fone new industry, he smoothed the way for our modern stick up men and law violator.

This is what Professor William E. Dodd of the department of history at the University of Chicago believes to be the fundamental theory of crime—where crime is common, crime grows—as especially applied to local conditions.

"In the early days in this mid west country," says Professor Dodd, "the settlers robbed the Indians, defied the laws and defrauded the United States government as a matter of course. Individuals, courts and states connived at the importation of slaves into a free territory. States claimed the right to violate federal laws. This habit of mind has had abiding influence in the making of public opinion.

"Later, in the '80s, men etnered into a new era of contempt for law. Great and respectable business men violated state and federal laws in the management of great railways and businesses in this mid west country. Immigrants flooded into big cities. Immigrants read the screaming head lines of lawless actions. They tried law breaking and got away with it. And where crime is common, crime grows."

MICHIGAN COWS SHOW BIG GAIN IN MILK OUTPUT

Producing an average of 301.9 pounds of butter fat and 7,634 pounds of milk during the past year, dairy cows under test in Michigan's 104 testing associations broke all previous state records.

More than 28,000 cows were under test, scattered over 62 counties. The average Michigan cow, according to the United States census for 1920, produced only 3,700 pounds of milk and 160 pounds of butter fat.

The increasingly high average, specialists say, is the result of selection and care.

Following her graduation she entered Albion college, at Albion, Michigan, where she remained a year, transferring to Syracuse in 1924.

STATE AIDS STUDY OF PARTRIDGE BY CORNELL SCIENTIST

Deputy state game wardens are taking ruffed grouse under orders of the conservation commission, to be sent to Cornell university for examination in a nation wide effect to learn the food habits, disease affecting and other data regarding this native game bird.

Michigan has been participating in this for several years. Previous examinations and study of birds have shown that partridge in Michigan are not afflicted with disease, although it was found prevalent among New York and Pennsylvania birds.

The scarcity of partridge in Michigan has often been laid to disease but the examinations at Cornell seems to have disproved this supposition. The claim that poison, put out by state wolf trappers, caused a large demise in grouse life has also been given the quietus after careful investigation. The predatory fox, weasel, coyote, skunk and owl probably will have to bear the burden of the rapidly increasing reduction in numbers of this specie of game bird.

Predatory animals, unfavorable weather conditions and natural causes rather than disease seem to have caused the great toll of this great game bird. While there has been a gradual reduction in the number of Michigan grouse for some years, there are those who claim that the tide has now turned and that last year witnessed the beginning of a slight increase.

TELLS OF JINX ON FIRE CREW NO. 2

How ill luck or a hoodoo visited the Grand Rapids No. 2 engine crew on two occasions and virtually demoralized that unit way back in 1895, during red blooded fire fighting days in Grand Rapids, is related by George Cotton, chief electrical inspector of the department and now one of its oldest employes in point of continuous service.

Mr. Cotton was driver of No. 2 steamer in those days of equine motored vehicles, and Thomas Gibbons, the oldest fireman of volunteer days, was No. 2 engineer. Topsy, a white mare and a particular pet of the firemen of No. 2, had pulled the steamer for 13 years. Topsy's mate, Barney, had no such lengthy record for service, but also was a pet of the engine crew.

One night, as Mr. Cotton tells it, No. 2 was summoned to the car barns, but the summons proved a false alarm. A few days afterward Topsy died of colic. A month later to a day No. 2 again was summoned to the car barns and this time, too, the alarm proved to be a false one. On the return trip to the engine house Barney went lame, then the boiler tubes of the steamer blew up, putting that piece of apparatus out of commission for a long period.

Contemplating the loss of Topsy, the injury to Barney and the seemingly irrepairable damage to the steamer, Engineer Gibbons, who long had been ailing, predicted that he had made his last run. His prediction came true, for a short time later he died.

DEEP PLOWING IS HELD KEY TO BIG SUGAR BEET YIELD

Michigan beet growers can bring about a substantial increase in tonnage produced by deep plowing, according to farm crops specialists at Michigan State college. The time of plowing also has a marked influence on yields, experiments show.

Trials conducted by the college show that two inches added to the depth of plowing increased the yield approximately one ton per acre. Land which was plowed six inches deep yielded one ton per acre more than that plowed four inches deep. Eight inches of depth of plowing gave a crop one ton heavier than the yield obtained from six inch plowing, and two tons heavier than that obtained when the furrow was only four inches deep. Ground plowed 10 inches deep yielded one ton per acre more than that plowed eight inches. In other words, every two inches of depth added to the furrow, between four and ten inches, added one ton per acre to the yield. The ground should be plowed as deeply as possible without disturbing the substoil.

Beets planted on fall plowed ground have averaged one ton to the acre more than those planted on spring plowed ground with all conditions similar except the time of plowing.

Dry Prophecy Coming True

Ever since the beginning of prohibition the drys have maintained that the home brew and home wine making fad would wear itself out in due season. The following report from a daily newspaper would seem to bear them out:

Paw Paw, March 2.—Grape growers in southwestern Michigan are trying to figure out whether the depression in their industry is due to the operations of bootleggers and smugglers of moonshine and Canadian liquors or to the laxness or inability of public officials to enforce the prohibition law.

Some believe a slump in home wine making is due to a change in the public taste since the novelty of making their own has worn off. Whatever the cause the growers admit the demand for wine grapes in 1926 was not what it used to be. The season opened with a display of strength last fall but the finish was disastrous for both growers and shippers.

One large shipper in southwestern Michigan said he was convinced the depression was due to home wine making going out of date. He said a certain dealer in VanBuren county sold 300 tons of grapes early in the season to a party in Detroit, receiving a $1,000 deposit to bind the deal, the buyer never closed the deal, forfeiting his deposit. The dealer investigated and is reported to have found that the anticipated demand for grapes for home wine making had failed to materialize.

WHY BLAME THE DRY LAW?

Wet newspapers are trying to make capital out of a recent survey of New York by the city's medical inspector, which shows an increasing number of deaths from bootleg liquor. He declares that there is no actual prohibition in the city, and that 'all people who drank before prohibition are drinking now, provided they are still alive."

While the wets are charging this condition to the prohibition law, the drys are having something to say.

That Dr. Norris' figures confute themselves is the contention of S. E. Nicholson, of the Anti-Saloon League. Mr. Nicholson declares that for the eight years prior to 1918—the period of license as he calls it—the number of alcoholic deaths averaged 619. But in 1918, 1919 and 1920, the years when Prohibition was enforced most strictly, he says, deaths from alcoholism fell to 252, 176, and 98 respectively. "That alcoholic deaths have increased during the last four years," he declares, "is not due to prohibition, but to open rebellion against the law."

Dr. Francis Scott McBride, general superintendent of the League, makes this pointed statement:

"Of course, there has been an increase of alcoholism in New York city since 1922. That was the year Governor Al Smith helped to hoist the red flag of the bootlegger over the Statehouse. He, in effect, issued an invitation to the liquor outlaws of the nation to come to New York when he signed the bill to repeal the state enforcement code."—The Michigan Union.

We hope these youngsters will soon learn that a public dance in Hillsdale County is an expensive place to exhibit even a "small load" of booze or its by products.

For trying to make one set of license plates take the place of two sets, Leonard Reasoner, Ransom Township was arrested near Waldron, Saturday night and brought to jail. He will tell the Judge about it Monday.

Col. E. H. Kerr, Sheriff.

The weekly reports which the Sheriff has been furnishing to the County newspapers were made the subject of a considerable amount of favorable comment in an editorial in the "Sheriffs', Police, and Peace Officers' Review", the Official organ of the International Sheriffs' and Peace Officers' Association.

No Bacillus Hugibus

They tell us microbes lurk upon
The pouting ruby lips
That fierce bacilli lurk to grab
With terrifying grips
The man who dares to take a kiss
Without a trembling shrug

The germs of every known complaint
Are in the air we breathe
Each honeyed nothing we may hear with direct ills may seethe
Who knows? The coyest glance may hold
A bad microbe thug.
Its good to know they have not found
A microbe in a hug,

We will not lay us down and die
Nor petulantly sneeze,
Because of any illnesses
Contracted in a sneeze
So bring the bobsled and the girls,
And tuck ourselves in snug—
One joy in life remains unscathed—
No microbes in a hug.

This poetic gem was picked up and submitted to us by a subscriber who says he believes in it. What d'ye think of such a person, anyhow? He's young and impressionable.
